

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

38.

863.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN
OF
FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.

VOL. III.

LONDON :
PRINTED BY SAMUEL BENTLEY,
Dorset Street, Fleet Street.

Engraved by W. Frothingham from a very scarce woodcut.

THE LIFE OF

JOHN WILSON

BY J. WILSON, Esq. of the Middle Temple

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF
FERDINAND AND ISABELLA,
THE CATHOLIC,
OF SPAIN.

BY WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT.

Conjugio tali ! Quæ surgere regna
Virgil. Æneid. iv. 47.

Crevère vires, famaue et imperi
Porrecta majestas ab Euro
Solis ad Occiduum cubile.
Horat. Carm. iv. 15.

IN THREE VOLUMES.
VOL. III.

LONDON:
RICHARD BENTLEY, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.
Publisher in Ordinary to Her Majesty.
1838.

863.

CONTENTS
OF
VOLUME THE THIRD.

PART THE SECOND.

(CONTINUED.)

THE PERIOD WHEN, THE INTERIOR ORGANIZATION OF THE MONARCHY HAVING BEEN COMPLETED, THE SPANISH NATION ENTERED ON ITS SCHEMES OF DISCOVERY AND CONQUEST; OR, THE PERIOD ILLUSTRATING MORE PARTICULARLY THE FOREIGN POLICY OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.

CHAPTER VIII.

COLUMBUS.—PROSECUTION OF DISCOVERY.—HIS TREATMENT BY THE COURT.

	Page
Progress of Discovery	3
Misconduct of the Colonists	5
Complaints against Columbus	6
His Second Return	7
The Queen's Confidence in him unshaken	8
Honours conferred on him	10
His Third Voyage	11
Discovers Terra Firma	12
Mutiny in the Colony	12

	Page
Loud Complaints against Columbus	13
Bigoted Views in regard to the Heathen	15
More liberal Sentiments of Isabella	16
She sends back the Indian Slaves	18
Authority to Bobadilla	19
Outrage on Columbus	19
Deep Regret of the Sovereigns	21
Reception of Columbus	21
Vindication of the Sovereigns	22
Commission to Ovando	24
Groundless Imputations on the Government	26
The Admiral's Despondency	29
His Fourth and Last Voyage	30
Remarkable Fate of his Enemies	31

CHAPTER IX.

SPANISH COLONIAL POLICY.

Careful Provision for the Colonies	33
Liberal Grants	34
License for Private Voyages	36
Their Success	37
Indian Department	38
Casa de Contratacion	39
Important Papal Concessions	39
Spirit of the Colonial Legislation	41
The Queen's Zeal for Converting the Natives	43
Unhappily defeated	44
Immediate Profits from the Discoveries	46
Origin of the Venereal Disease	49
Moral Consequences of the Discoveries	51
Their Geographical Extent	53
Historians of the New World	55
Peter Martyr and Herrera...	56
Muñoz	57

CHAPTER X.

ITALIAN WARS.—PARTITION OF NAPLES.—GONSALVO OVER-RUNS CALABRIA.

	Page
Louis XII.'s Designs on Italy	59
Politics of that Country	59
The French conquer Milan	60
Alarm of the Spanish Court	61
Remonstrance to the Pope	62
Boldness of Garcilasso de la Vega	63
Negotiations with Venice and the Emperor	63
Louis openly menaces Naples	64
Views of Ferdinand	66
Fleet fitted out under Gonsalvo de Cordova	67
Partition of Naples	68
Ground of Ferdinand's Claim	69
Gonsalvo sails against the Turks	72
Storming of St. George	73
Honours paid to Gonsalvo	74
The Pope confirms the Partition	75
Astonishment of Italy	76
Success and Cruelties of the French	78
Fate of Frederic	78
Gonsalvo invades Calabria	80
Invests Tarento	81
Discontents in the Army	82
Munificence of Gonsalvo	83
He punishes a Mutiny	84
Bolder Plan of Attack	85
Tarento surrenders	87
Perjury of Gonsalvo	87

CHAPTER XI.

ITALIAN WARS.—RUPTURE WITH FRANCE.—GONSALVO BESIEGED IN BARLETA.

	Page
Mutual Distrust of the French and Spaniards	90
Cause of Rupture	91
The French begin Hostilities	93
The Italians favour them	94
The French Army	96
Inferiority of the Spaniards	97
Gonsalvo retires to Barleta	99
Siege of Canosa	100
Chivalrous character of the War	102
Tournament near Trani	102
Duel between Bayard and Sotomayor	104
Distress of the Spaniards	106
Spirit of Gonsalvo	107
The French reduce Calabria	108
Constancy of the Spaniards	109
Nemours defies the Spaniards	110
Rout of the French Rear-guard	110
Arrival of Supplies	111
Design on Ruvo	113
Gonsalvo storms and takes it	114
His Treatment of the Prisoners	115
Prepares to leave Barleta	117

CHAPTER XII.

ITALIAN WARS. — NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE. — VICTORY OF CERIGNOLA.—SURRENDER OF NAPLES.

Birth of Charles V.	118
Philip and Joanna visit Spain	119
Recognised by Cortes	121
Philip's Discontent	123

CONTENTS.

ix

	Page
Leaves Spain for France	124
Negotiates a Treaty with Louis XII.	125
Treaty of Lyons	126
The Great Captain refuses to comply with it ...	128
Marches out of Barleta	129
Distress of the Troops	130
Encamps before Cerignola	131
Nemours pursues	132
The Spanish Forces	133
The French Forces	133
Battle of Cerignola	134
Death of Nemours	135
Rout of the French	136
Their Loss	137
Pursuit of the Enemy	138
D'Aubigny defeated	139
Submission of Naples	140
Triumphant Entry of Gonsalvo	141
Fortresses of Naples	142
Castel Nuovo stormed	143
Nearly all the Kingdom reduced	144

CHAPTER XIII.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE.—UNSUCCESSFUL INVASION OF SPAIN.—TRUCE.

Treaty of Lyons	146
Rejected by Ferdinand	147
His Policy examined	148
Joanna's Despondency	152
First Symptoms of her Insanity	153
The Queen hastens to her	154
Isabella's Distress	155
Her Illness and Fortitude	156
The French invade Spain	157
Siege of Salsas	158

	Page
Isabella's Exertions	159
Ferdinand's Successes	161
Truce with France	163
Reflexions on the Campaign	164
Impediments to Historic Accuracy	166
Speculative Writers	167

CHAPTER XIV.

ITALIAN WARS.—CONDITION OF ITALY.—FRENCH AND SPANISH ARMIES ON THE GARIGLIANO.

Melancholy Condition of Italy	169
Views of the Italian States	173
Of the Emperor	175
Great Preparations of Louis XII.	176
Death of Alexander VI.	177
Electioneering Intrigues	179
Julius II.	180
Gonsalvo repulsed before Gaeta	181
Strength of his Forces	183
Occupies San Germano	183
The French encamp on the Garigliano	184
Passage of the Bridge	185
Desperate Resistance	187
The French resume their Quarters	189
Anxious Expectation of Italy	190
Gonsalvo strengthens his Position	191
Great Distress of the Army	192
Gonsalvo's Resolution	193
Remarkable Instance of it	194
Patience of the Spaniards	194
Situation of the French	195
Their Insubordination	195
Saluzzo takes the Command	196
Heroism of Paredes and Bayard	197

CHAPTER XV.

ITALIAN WARS. — BOUT OF THE GARIGLIANO. — TREATY WITH FRANCE.—GONSALVO'S MILITARY CONDUCT.

	Page
Gonsalvo secures the Orsini	200
Assumes the Offensive	201
Plan of Attack	202
Consternation of the French	203
They retreat on Gaeta	204
Action at the Bridge of Mola	205
Hotly contested	206
Arrival of the Spanish Rear	207
The French routed	207
Their Loss	209
Gallantry of their Chivalry	210
Capitulation of Gaeta	210
Gonsalvo's Courtesy	211
Chagrin of Louis XII.	213
Sufferings of the French	214
The Spaniards occupy Gaeta	215
Public Enthusiasm	216
Extortion of the Spanish Troops	217
Gonsalvo's Liberality to his Officers	218
Apprehensions of Louis XII.	219
Treaty with France	220
Gallantry of Louis d'Ars	221
Causes of the French Failures	223
Review of Gonsalvo's Conduct	224
His Reform of the Service	225
Influence over the Army	226
His Confidence in their Character	227
Position of the Army	229
Results of the Campaigns	230
Memoirs of Gonsalvo de Cordova	231
French Chronicles	232

CHAPTER XVI.

ILLNESS AND DEATH OF ISABELLA.—HER CHARACTER.

	Page
Decline of the Queen's Health	235
Mad Conduct of Joanna	237
The Queen seized with a Fever	238
Retains her energies	239
Alarm of the Nation	240
Her Testament	241
Settles the Succession	242
Ferdinand named Regent	243
Provision for him	243
Her Codicil	245
She fails rapidly	247
Her Resignation and Death	248
Her Remains transported to Granada	249
Laid in the Alhambra	249
Isabella's Person	250
Her Manners	251
Her Magnanimity	253
Her Piety	254
Her Bigotry	256
Common to her Age	257
And later Times	258
Her Strength of Principle	259
Her Practical Sense	260
Her unwearied Activity	261
Her Courage	263
Her Sensibility	265
Parallel with Queen Elizabeth	267
Universal Homage to her Virtues	273

CHAPTER XVII.

FERDINAND REGENT.—HIS SECOND MARRIAGE.—DISSENSIONS WITH PHILIP.—RESIGNATION OF THE REGENCY.

	Page
Philip and Joanna proclaimed	275
Discontent of the Nobles	278
Don Juan Manuel	279
Philip's Pretensions	280
His Party increases	280
He tampers with Gonsalvo de Cordova	281
Ferdinand's Perplexities	282
Proposals for a second Marriage	284
Policy of Louis XII.	285
Treaty with France	286
Its Impolicy	288
Concord of Salamanca	290
Philip and Joanna embark	291
Reach Coruña	292
Philip joined by the Nobles	294
His Character	295
Ferdinand unpopular	295
Interview with Philip	297
Courteous Deportment of Ferdinand	298
Philip's Distrust	299
Ferdinand resigns the Regency	300
His private Protest	301
His Motives	302
Second Interview	303
Departure of Ferdinand	304
Authorities for the Account of Philip	304

CHAPTER XVIII.

COLUMBUS.—HIS RETURN TO SPAIN.—HIS DEATH.

	Page
Columbus's last Voyage	305
He learns Isabella's Death	306
His Illness	307
He visits the Court	308
Ferdinand's unjust Treatment of him	309
He declines in Health and Spirits	311
His Death	311
His Person and Habits	313
His Enthusiasm	314
His lofty Character	315

CHAPTER XIX.

REIGN AND DEATH OF PHILIP I.—PROCEEDINGS IN CASTILE.—
FERDINAND VISITS NAPLES.

Philip and Joanna	317
Philip's arbitrary Government	318
Reckless Extravagance	319
Troubles from the Inquisition	320
Ferdinand's Distrust of Gonsalvo	323
He sails for Naples	324
Gonsalvo's Loyalty	324
Death of Philip	327
His Character	328
Provisional Government	330
Joanna's Condition	332
Convocation of Cortes	333
Ferdinand received with Enthusiasm	334
His Entry into Naples	335
Restores the Angevins	337
General Dissatisfaction	338

CHAPTER XX.

FERDINAND'S RETURN AND REGENCY.—GONSALVO'S HONOURS AND RETIREMENT.

	Page
Meeting of Cortes	340
Joanna's insane Conduct	340
She changes her Ministers	343
Disorderly State of Castile	344
Distress of the Kingdom	345
Ferdinand's politic Behaviour	346
He leaves Naples	347
Gonsalvo de Cordova	349
Grief of the Neapolitans	351
Brilliant Interview of Ferdinand and Louis	352
Compliments to Gonsalvo	354
The King's Reception in Castile	356
Joanna's Retirement	357
Irregularity of Ferdinand's Proceedings	359
General Amnesty	359
He establishes a Guard	360
His excessive Severity	362
Disgust of the Nobles	364
Gonsalvo's Progress through the Country	365
Ferdinand breaks his Word	365
The Queen's Coolness	366
Gonsalvo withdraws from Court	367
Splendour of his Retirement	368

CHAPTER XXI.

XIMENES.—CONQUESTS IN AFRICA.—UNIVERSITY OF ALCALÁ.— POLYGLOT BIBLE.

Policy of Ferdinand's Severity	370
Enthusiasm of Ximenes	372
His Designs against Oran	373

					Page
His warlike Preparations	374
His Perseverance	375
Sends an Army to Africa	376
Addresses the Troops	377
The Command left to Navarro	378
Battle before Oran	379
The City stormed	380
Moorish Loss	381
Ximenes enters Oran	381
Opposition of his General	383
His Distrust of Ferdinand	384
Ximenes returns to Spain	385
Refuses public Honours	385
Navarro's African Conquests	387
College of Ximenes at Alcalá	390
Its Magnificence	392
Provisions for Education	393
The King visits the University	395
Polyglot edition of the Bible	397
Difficulties of the Task	399
Grand Projects of Ximenes	402

CHAPTER XXII.

WARS AND POLITICS OF ITALY.

Projects against Venice	405
League of Cambray	405
Its Origin	406
Louis XII. invades Italy	408
Resolution of Venice	409
Alarm of Ferdinand	410
Investiture of Naples	412
Holy League	413
Gaston de Foix	414
Battle of Ravenna	415
Death of Gaston de Foix	417

CONTENTS.

xvii

						Page
His Character	417
The French retreat		419
Venice disgusted	420
Battle of Novara	421
Of La Motta	422
The Spaniards victorious		422
Daru's " Histoire de Venise "			423

CHAPTER XXIII.

CONQUEST OF NAVARRE.

Sovereigns of Navarre	424
Distrust of Spain	426
Negotiations with France	427
Ferdinand demands a Passage		428
Navarre allied to France	429
Invaded and conquered by Alva		430
Character of Juan d'Albret		432
Discontent of the English	433
Discomfiture of the French		434
Treaty of Orthès	435
Ferdinand settles his Conquests		437
United with Castile	437
The King's Conduct examined		438
Right of Passage	441
Imprudence of Navarre	442
It authorises War	443
Gross Abuse of Victory	444
Authorities for the History of Navarre			445

CHAPTER XXIV.

DEATH OF GONSALVO DE CORDOVA.—ILLNESS AND DEATH OF FERDINAND.—HIS CHARACTER.

	Page
Maximilian's Pretensions	447
Gonsalvo ordered to Italy	449
General Enthusiasm	449
The King's Distrust	450
Gonsalvo goes into Retirement	451
The King's desire for Children	452
Decline of his Health	453
Gonsalvo's Illness and Death	454
Public Grief	455
His Character	457
His private Virtues	459
His Want of Faith	460
His Loyalty	461
Ferdinand's Illness increases	462
His Insensibility to his Situation	463
His last Hours	464
His Death and Testament	467
His Body transported to Granada	468
His Person and Character	470
His Temperance and Economy	471
His Bigotry	473
Accused of Hypocrisy	474
His Perfidy	475
His shrewd Policy	476
His Insensibility	478
Contrast with Isabella	479
His kingly Qualities	482
Judgment of his Contemporaries	483

CHAPTER XXV.

ADMINISTRATION, DEATH, AND CHARACTER OF CARDINAL XIMENES.

	Page
Disputes respecting the Regency	486
Charles proclaimed King	488
Anecdote of Ximenes	489
His Military Ordinance	489
His domestic Policy	490
His foreign Policy	490
Assumes the sole Power	493
Intimidates the Nobles	494
Public Discontents	494
Treaty of Noyon	496
Charles lands in Spain	497
His ungrateful Letter	498
The Cardinal's last Illness	498
His Death	500
His Character	501
His versatility of Talent	501
His despotic Government	502
His moral Principle	504
His Disinterestedness	505
His monastic Austerities	506
His Economy of Time	508
His Person	509
Parallel with Richelieu	510
Notice of Galindez de Carbajal	512

CHAPTER XXVI.

GENERAL REVIEW OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.

Policy of the Crown	515
Depression of the Nobles	516

	Page
Their great Power	518
Treatment of the Church	521
Care of Morals	522
State of the Commons	523
Their Consideration	525
Royal Ordinances	527
Arbitrary Measures of Ferdinand	530
Advancement of Prerogative	535
Legal Compilations	536
Organization of Councils	538
Legal Profession advanced	539
Character of the Laws	540
Erroneous Principles of Legislation	542
Principal Exports	547
Manufactures	548
Agriculture	549
Economical Policy	552
Internal Improvements	554
Increase of Empire	556
Government of Naples	557
Revenues from the Indies	559
Spirit of Adventure	560
Progress of Discovery	562
Excesses of the Spaniards	563
Slavery in the Colonies	566
Colonial Administration	569
General Prosperity	571
Public Embellishments	573
Augmentation of Revenue	575
Increase of Population	576
Patriotic Principle	579
Chivalrous Spirit of the People	580
Spirit of Bigotry	583
Beneficent Impulse	585
The Period of National Glory	588

THE LIFE AND TIMES
OF
FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.

PART THE SECOND

Continued.

1493—1517.

THE PERIOD WHEN THE INTERIOR ORGANIZATION OF THE MONARCHY HAVING BEEN COMPLETED, THE SPANISH NATION ENTERED ON ITS SCHEMES OF DISCOVERY AND CONQUEST; OR, THE PERIOD ILLUSTRATING MORE PARTICULARLY THE FOREIGN POLICY OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.

CHAPTER VIII.

COLUMBUS.—PROSECUTION OF DISCOVERY.—HIS TREATMENT BY THE COURT.

1494 — 1503.

It is with satisfaction that the course of our history now permits me to turn from the melancholy and mortifying details of superstition to the generous efforts which the Spanish government was making to enlarge the limits of science and dominion in the West. “Amidst the storms and troubles of Italy, Spain was every day stretching her wings over a wider sweep of empire, and extending the glory of her name to the far antipodes.” Such is the swell of exultation with which the enthusiastic Italian, Martyr, notices the brilliant progress of discovery under his illustrious countryman Columbus.* The Spanish sovereigns had never lost sight of the new domain so unexpectedly opened to them, as it were, from the depths of the ocean. The first accounts transmitted by the great navigator and his companions, on his second voyage, while their imaginations were warm with the beauty and novelty of the scenes which met their eyes in the New World, served to keep alive the tone of excitement which their unexpected successes had kindled in the nation.* The various specimens sent home in the return ships, of the products of these unknown regions, confirmed the agreeable belief that they formed part of the great Asiatic continent, which had so long excited the cupidity of Europeans. The Spanish court, sharing in the general enthusiasm, endeavoured to promote the spirit of discovery and colonization by forwarding the requisite supplies, and complying promptly with the most minute suggestions of Columbus; but in less than two years from the commencement of his second voyage, the face of things experienced a melancholy change. Accounts were received at home of the most alarming discontent and disaffection in the colony, while the actual returns from these vaunted regions were so scanty as to bear no proportion to the expenses of the expedition.

* “Inter has Italiæ procellas magis indies ac magis alas protendit Hispania, imperium au-

get, gloriam nomenque suum ad antipodes porriget.” Pet. Martyr, Opus Epistolarum, ep. 146.

* See among others a letter of Dr. Chanca, who accompanied Columbus on his second voyage. It is addressed to the authorities of Seville. After noticing the evidences of gold in Hispaniola, he says, "Ansi que de cierto los Reyes nuestros Señores desde agora se pueden tener por los mas prosperos e mas ricos Principes del mundo, porque tal cosa hasta agora no se ha visto ni leido de ninguno en el mundo, porque verdaderamente a otro camino que los navios vuelvan puedan llevar tanta cantidad de oro que se pueden maravillar cualesquiera que lo supieren." In another part of the letter, the Doctor is equally sanguine in regard to the fruitfulness of the soil and climate. Letra de Dr. Chanca, ap. Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. i. pp. 198—224.

This unfortunate result was in a great measure imputable to the misconduct of the colonists themselves. Most of them were adventurers who had embarked with no other expectation than that of getting together a fortune as speedily as possible in the golden Indies. They were without subordination, patience, industry, or any of the regular habits demanded for success in such an enterprise. As soon as they had launched from their native shore, they seemed to feel themselves released from the constraints of all law. They harboured jealousy and distrust of the admiral as a foreigner. The cavaliers and hidalgos, of whom there were too many in the expedition, contemned him as an upstart, whom it was derogatory to obey. From the first moment of their landing in Hispaniola, they indulged the most wanton license in regard to the unoffending natives, who in the simplicity of their hearts had received the white men as messengers from heaven. Their outrages, however, soon provoked a general resistance, which led to such a war of extermination, that, in less than four years after the Spaniards had set foot on the island, one third of its population, amounting probably to several hundred thousands, was sacrificed! Such were the melancholy auspices under which the intercourse was opened between the civilized white man and the simple natives of the western world.*

* Fernando Colon, Hist. del Almirante, cap. lx. lxii. ap. Bar-cia, Histor. Primitivos de las Ind. Occidental. tom. i. — Muñoz,

These excesses, and the total neglect of agriculture, — for none would condescend to turn up the earth for any other object than the gold they could find in it,—at length occasioned an alarming scarcity of provisions; while the poor Indians neglected their usual husbandry, being willing to starve themselves, so that they could starve out their oppressors.* In order to avoid the famine which now menaced his little colony, Columbus was obliged to resort to coercive measures, shortening the allowance of food, and compelling all to work, without distinction of rank. These unpalatable regulations soon bred general discontent. The high-mettled hidalgos, especially, complained loudly of the indignity of such mechanical drudgery, while Father Boil and his brethren were equally outraged by the diminution of their regular rations.†

The Spanish sovereigns were now daily assailed with complaints of the mal-administration of Columbus, and of his impolitic and unjust severities to both Spaniards and natives. They lent, however, an unwilling ear to these vague accusations; they fully appreciated the difficulties of his situation; and al-

Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. v. sec. xxv.—Herrera, Historia General de las Ind. Occid. Dec. i. lib. ii. cap. ix.—Benzoni, Novæ Novi Orbis Hist. lib. i. cap. ix.

* The Indians had some grounds for relying on the efficacy of starvation, if, as Las Casas gravely asserts, “one Spaniard consumed in a single day as much as would suffice three families !” Œuvres de Las Casas, trad. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 11.

† Pet. Martyr, De Rebus Oceanicis et Novo Orbe, Dec. i. lib. iv.—Gomara, Historia de las Indias, cap. xx. ap. Barcia, Historiadores Primitivos, tom. ii.—Herrera, Hist. General de las Ind. Occid. Dec. i. lib. ii. cap. xii.

though they sent out an agent (August 1495) to inquire into the nature of the troubles which threatened the existence of the colony, they were careful to select an individual who, they thought, would be most grateful to the admiral; and when the latter in the following year, July 12th, 1496, returned to Spain, they received him with the most ample acknowledgments of regard. "Come to us," they said in a kind letter of congratulation, addressed to him soon after his arrival, "when you can do it without inconvenience to yourself, for you have endured too many vexations already." *

The admiral brought with him, as before, such samples of the productions of the western hemisphere as would strike the public eye, and keep alive the feeling of curiosity. On his journey through Andalusia he passed some days under the hospitable roof of the good curate Bernaldez, who dwells with much satisfaction on the remarkable appearance of the Indian chiefs following in the admiral's train, gorgeously decorated with golden collars and coronets, and various barbaric ornaments. Among these he particularly notices certain "belts and masks of cotton and of wood, with figures of the devil embroidered and carved thereon, sometimes in his own proper likeness, and at others in that of a cat or an owl. There is much reason," he infers, "to believe that he appears to the islanders in this guise, and that they are all idolaters, having Satan for their lord !” *

* Navarrete, Colec. de Viag. y Descubr. de los Españoles, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 101.—Fern. Colon, Hist. del Almi-

rante, cap. lxiv.—Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. v. sect. xxxi.

But neither the attractions of the spectacle, nor the glowing representations of Columbus, who fancied he had discovered in the mines of Hispaniola the golden quarries of Ophir, from which King Solomon had enriched the temple of Jerusalem, could rekindle the dormant enthusiasm of the nation. The novelty of the thing had passed. They heard a different tale, moreover, from the other voyagers, whose wan and sallow visages provoked the bitter jest, that they had returned with more gold in their faces than in their pockets. In short, the scepticism of the public seemed now quite in proportion to its former overweening confidence ; and the returns were so meagre, says Bernaldez, “ that it was very generally believed there was little or no gold in the island.” †

Isabella was far from participating in this unreasonable distrust. She had espoused the theory of Columbus, when others looked coldly or contemptuously on it.† She firmly relied on his repeated as-

* Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. cxxxi.—Herrera expresses the same charitable opinion. “ Muyclaramente se conocio que el demonio estava apoderado de aquella gente, y la traia ciega y engañada, hablandoles, y mostrandoles en diversas figuras.” Hist. General, lib. iii. cap. iv.

† Bernaldez, Hist. de los Reyes Catolicos, MS. cap. cxxxi.

— Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. vi. sec. i.

‡ Columbus, in a letter to Prince John’s nurse, dated 1500, makes the following ample acknowledgement of the queen’s early protection of him. “ En todos hobo incredulidad, y a la Reina mi Señora dio Nuestro Señor el espiritu de inteligencia y esfuerzo grande, y la hizo de surances, that the track of discovery would lead to other and more important regions. She formed a higher estimate, moreover, of the value of the new acquisitions than any founded on the actual proceeds in gold and silver ; keeping ever in view, as her letters and instructions abundantly show, the glorious purpose of introducing the blessings of Christian civilization among the heathen.* She entertained a deep sense of the merits of Columbus, to whose serious and elevated character her own bore much resemblance ; although the enthusiasm, which distinguished each, was naturally tempered in her with somewhat more of benignity and discretion.

But although willing to give the most effectual support to his great enterprise, the situation of the country was such as made delay in its immediate prosecution unavoidable. Large expense was necessarily incurred for the actual maintenance of the colony ;† the exchequer was liberally drained, moreover, by the Italian war, as well as by the profuse magnificence with which the nuptials of the royal family were now celebrating. It was, indeed, in the midst of the courtly revelries attending the marriage of Prince John, that the admiral presented himself todo heredera como a cara y muy amada hija." "Su Alteza lo aprobaba al contrario, y lo sostuvo fasta que pudo." Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. i. p. 266.

* See the letters to Columbus, dated May 14, 1493, August 1494, ap. Navarrete, Collec-cion de Viages, tom. ii. pp. 66, 154, et mult. al.

† The salaries alone annually disbursed by the crown to persons resident in the colony amounted to six million maravedis. Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. v. sec. xxxiii.

before the sovereigns at Burgos, after his second voyage. Such was the low condition of the treasury from these causes, that Isabella was obliged to defray the cost of an outfit to the colony, at this time, from funds originally destined for the marriage of her daughter Isabella with the King of Portugal.*

This unwelcome delay, however, was softened to Columbus by the distinguished marks which he daily received of the royal favour ; and various ordinances were passed, confirming and enlarging his great powers and privileges in the most ample manner, to a greater extent, indeed, than his modesty or his prudence would allow him to accept.† The language in which these princely gratuities were conferred, rendered them doubly grateful to his noble heart, containing, as they did, the most emphatic acknowledgments of his “many, good, loyal, distinguished, and continual services,” and thus testifying the unabated confidence of his sovereigns in his integrity and prudence.‡

* Muñoz, Hist. Nuevo Mundo, lib. vi. sect. ii.—F. Colon, Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxiv.—Herrera, Hist. General de las Ind. lib. iii. cap. i.

† Such for example was the grant of an immense tract of land in Hispaniola, with the title of count or duke, as the admiral might prefer. Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. vi. sec. xvii.

‡ The instrument establishing the mayorazgo, or perpetual entail of Columbus's estates, contains an injunction, that “his heirs shall never use any other signature than that of ‘the admiral,’ el almirante, whatever other titles and honours may belong to them.” That title indicated his peculiar achievements, and it was an honest pride which led him by this simple expedient to perpetuate the remembrance of them in his posterity. See the original document, ap. Navarrete, Viages, &c. tom. ii. pp. 221—235.

Among the impediments to the immediate completion of the arrangements for the admiral's departure on his third voyage may be also noticed the hostility of Bishop Fonseca, who at this period had the control of the Indian department; a man of an irritable and, as it would seem, most unforgiving temper, who, from some causes of disgust which he had conceived with Columbus previous to his second voyage, lost no opportunity of annoying and thwarting him, for which his official station unfortunately afforded him too many facilities.*.

From these various circumstances the admiral's fleet was not ready before the beginning of 1498. Even then further embarrassment occurred in manning it, as few were found willing to embark in a service which had fallen into such general discredit. This led to the ruinous expedient of substituting convicts, whose regular punishments were commuted into transportation for a limited period to the Indies. No measure could possibly have been devised more effectual for the ruin of the infant settlement. The seeds of corruption which had been so long festering in the Old World, soon shot up into a plentiful harvest in the New, and Columbus, who suggested the measure, was the first to reap the fruits of it.

At length, all being in readiness, the admiral embarked on board his little squadron, consisting of six vessels, whose complement of men, notwithstanding every exertion, was still deficient, and took his departure from the port of St. Lucar, May 30, 1498. He steered in a more southerly direction than, on his preceding voyages, and on the 1st of August succeeded in reaching terra firma; thus entitling himself to the glory of being the first to set foot on the great southern continent, to which he had before opened the way.*

* Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. vi. sec. xx.—Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxiv.—Zuñiga, Anales de Sevilla, anno 1496.

It is not necessary to pursue the track of the illustrious voyager, whose career, forming the most brilliant episode to the history of the present reign, has been so recently traced by a hand which few will care to follow. It will suffice briefly to notice his personal relations with the Spanish government, and the principles on which the colonial administration was conducted.

On his arrival at Hispaniola, Columbus found the affairs of the colony in the most deplorable confusion. An insurrection had been raised by the arts of a few factious individuals against his brother Bartholomew, to whom he had intrusted the government during his absence. In this desperate rebellion all the interests of the community were neglected. The mines, which were just beginning to yield a golden harvest, remained unwrought. The unfortunate natives were subjected to the most inhuman oppression: there was no law but that of the strongest. Columbus, on his arrival, in vain endeavoured to restore order; the very crews he brought with him, who had been unfortunately reprieved from the gibbet in their own country, served to swell the mass of mutiny. The admiral exhausted art, negotiation, entreaty, force, and succeeded at length in patching up a specious reconciliation by such concessions as essentially impaired his own authority. Among these was the grant of large tracts of land to the rebels, with permission to the proprietor to employ an allotted number of the natives in its cultivation. This was the origin of the celebrated system of repartimientos, which subsequently led to the foulest abuses that ever disgraced humanity.*

* Pet. Martyr, De Rebus Oceanicis, Dec. i. lib. vi.—Navarrete, Viages y Descubr. de los Españoles, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. Nos. 116. 120.—Tercer, Viage de Colon, ap. Navarrete, tom. i.

p. 245.—Benzoni, Nov. Novi Orbis Hist. lib. i. cap. x. xi.—Herrera, Hist. General de las Ind. Occidental. Dec. i. lib. iii. c. x. xi.—Muñoz, Nuevo Mundo, lib. vi. sec. xix.

Nearly a year elapsed after the admiral's return to Hispaniola, before he succeeded in allaying these intestine feuds. In the mean while, rumours were every day reaching Spain of the distractions of the colony, accompanied with most injurious imputations on the conduct of Columbus and his brother, who were loudly accused of oppressing both Spaniards and Indians, and of sacrificing the public interests, in the most unscrupulous manner, to their own. These complaints were rung in the very ears of the sovereigns by numbers of the disaffected colonists,

* Gomara, Hist. de las Indias, c. xx.—Benzoni, N. Novi Orbis Historiæ, lib. i. c. x. xi.—Garibay, Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. vii.—Hist. del Almirante, c. lxxiii—lxxxii.—Pet. Martyr, De Reb. Oceanic. Dec. i. lib. v.—Herrera, Hist. de las Ind. Dec. i. lib. iii. cap. xvi.—Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. vi. sec. xl—xlii.

who had returned to Spain, and who surrounded the king as he rode out on horseback, clamoring loudly for the discharge of the arrears, of which they said the admiral had defrauded them.*

There were not wanting even persons of high consideration at the court to give credence and circulation to these calumnies. The recent discovery of the pearl fisheries of Paria, as well as of more prolific veins of the precious metals in Hispaniola, and the prospect of an indefinite extent of unexplored country, opened by the late voyage of Columbus, made the viceroyalty of the New World a tempting bait for the avarice and ambition of the most potent grandee. They artfully endeavoured, therefore, to undermine the admiral's credit with the sovereigns, by raising in their minds suspicions of his integrity, founded not merely on vague reports, but on letters received from the colony, charging him with disloyalty, with appropriating to his own use the revenues of the island, and with the design of erecting an independent government for himself.†

* Garibay, Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. vii.—P. Martyr, De Reb. Oceanicis, Dec. i. lib. vii. — Gomara, Hist. de las Indias, cap. xxiii.—Benzoni, N. Novi Orb. Hist. c. xi.

Ferdinand Columbus mentions that he and his brother, who were then pages to the queen, could not stir out into the court-yard of the Alhambra without being followed by fifty of these vagabonds, who insulted them in the grossest manner,

“as the sons of the adventurer who had led so many brave Spanish hidalgos to seek their graves in the land of vanity and delusion which he had found out.” Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxv.

† Benzoni, Nov. Orbis Hist. lib. i. c. xii. — National feeling operated, no doubt, as well as avarice to sharpen the tooth of slander against the admiral. “Ægrè multi patiuntur,” says Columbus's countryman, with Whatever weight these absurd charges may have had with Ferdinand, they had no power to shake the queen's confidence in Columbus, or lead her to suspect his loyalty for a moment; but the long-continued distractions of the colony made her feel a natural distrust of his capacity to govern it, whether from the jealousy entertained of him as a foreigner, or from some inherent deficiency in his own character. These doubts were mingled, it is true, with sterner feelings towards the admiral, on the arrival at this juncture of several of the rebels with the Indian slaves assigned to them by his orders.*

It was the received opinion among good catholics of that period, that heathen and barbarous nations were placed by the circumstance of their infidelity without the pale either of spiritual or civil rights. Their souls were doomed to eternal perdition; their bodies were the property of the Christian nation who should occupy their soil.† Such, in brief, were honest warmth, "peregrinum hominem, et quidem e nostrâ Italiâ ortum, tantum honoris ac gloriæ consequutum ut non tantum Hispanicæ gentis, sed et cujusvis alterius homines superaverit." Benzoni, lib. i. cap. v.

* Herrera, Hist. General de las Ind. Occidentales, lib. iv. cap. vii. x. and more especially lib. vi. cap. xiii.—Œuvres de Las Casas, trad. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 306.

† "La qualité de Catholique Romain," says the philosophic Villers, "avait tout-à-fait rem-

placé celle d'homme, et même de Chrétien. Qui n'était pas Catholique Romain, n'était pas homme, était moins qu'homme; et eût-il été un souverain, c'était une bonne action que de lui ôter la vie." (Essai sur la Réformation, p. 56; ed. 1820.) Las Casas rests the title of the Spanish crown to its American possessions on the original papal grant, made on condition of converting the natives to Christianity. The pope, as vicar of Jesus Christ, possesses plenary authority over all men for the

the profession and the practice of the most enlightened Europeans of the fifteenth century ; and such the deplorable maxims which regulated the intercourse of the Spanish and Portuguese navigators with the uncivilized natives of the western world.* Columbus, agreeably to these views, had, very soon after the occupation of Hispaniola, recommended a regular exchange of slaves for the commodities required for the support of the colony ; representing, moreover, that in this way their conversion would be more surely effected,—an object, it must be admitted, which he seems to have ever had most earnestly at heart.

Isabella, however, entertained views on this matter far more liberal than those of her age. She had safety of their souls. He might, therefore, in furtherance of this, confer on the Spanish sovereigns imperial supremacy over all lands discovered by them,—not however to the prejudice of authorities already existing there, and over such nations only as voluntarily embraced Christianity. Such is the sum of his thirty propositions, submitted to the council of the Indies for the inspection of Charles V. (Œuvres, trad. de Llorente, tom.i. pp.286—311.) One may see, in these arbitrary and whimsical limitations, the good bishop's desire to reconcile what reason told him was the natural rights of man, with what faith prescribed as the legitimate prerogative of the pope. Few Roman Catholics at the present day will be found sturdy enough to maintain this lofty prerogative, however carefully limited. Still fewer in the sixteenth century would have challenged it. Indeed it is but just to Las Casas to admit, that the general scope of his arguments, here and elsewhere, is very far in advance of his age.

* A Spanish casuist founds the right of his nation to enslave the Indians, among other things, on their smoking tobacco, and not trimming their beards à l'Espagnole. At least, this is Montesquieu's interpretation of it. (Esprit des Loix, lib. xv. chap. iii.) The doctors of the inquisition could hardly have found a better reason.

been deeply interested by the accounts she had received from the admiral himself, of the gentle, unoffending character of the islanders; and she revolted at the idea of consigning them to the horrors of slavery, without even an effort for their conversion. She hesitated, therefore, to sanction his proposal; and when a number of Indian captives were advertised to be sold in the markets of Andalusia, she commanded the sale to be suspended, till the opinion of a council of theologians and doctors, learned in such matters, could be obtained, as to its conscientious lawfulness. She yielded still further to the benevolent impulses of her nature, causing holy men to be instructed, as far as possible, in the Indian languages, and sent out as missionaries for the conversion of the natives.* Some of them, as Father Boil and his brethren, seem, indeed, to have been more concerned for the welfare of their own bodies than for the souls of their benighted flock; but others, imbued with a better spirit, wrought in the good work with disinterested zeal, and, if we may credit their accounts, with some efficacy.†

* Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. v. sec. xxxiv.—Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 92.—Herrera, Hist. Gen. de las Ind. lib. iii. cap. iv.

that from one to two thousand persons were baptized every day." (Vida de Ximenes de Cisneros, p. 120.)

Ferdinand Columbus remarks with some naïveté, that "the Indians were so obedient from their fear of the admiral, and at the same time so desirous to oblige him, that they voluntarily became Christians!" Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxiv.

† "Among other things that the holy fathers carried out," says Robles, "was a little organ and several bells, which greatly delighted the simple people, so

In the same beneficent spirit, the royal letters and ordinances urged over and over again the paramount obligation of the religious instruction of the natives, and of observing the utmost gentleness and humanity in all dealings with them. When therefore the queen learned the arrival of two vessels from the Indies, with three hundred slaves on board, which the admiral had granted to the mutineers, she could not repress her indignation, but impatiently asked, "By what authority does Columbus venture thus to dispose of my subjects?" (June 20, 1500.) She instantly caused proclamation to be made in the southern provinces, that all who had Indian slaves in their possession, granted by the admiral, should forthwith provide for their return to their own country; while the few still held by the crown were to be restored to freedom in like manner.*

After a long and visible reluctance, the queen acquiesced in sending out a commissioner to investigate the affairs of the colony. The person appointed to this delicate trust was Don Francisco de Bobadilla, a poor knight of Calatrava. He was invested with supreme powers of civil and criminal jurisdiction. He was to bring to trial and pass sentence on all such as had conspired against the authority of

* Herrera, Hist. Gen. de las Indias, lib. iv. cap. vii.—Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages y Descubrimientos, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 134.

Las Casas remarks that "so great was the queen's indignation at the admiral's misconduct in this particular, that nothing but the consideration of his great public services saved him from immediate disgrace." Œuvres, tom. i. p. 306.

Columbus. He was authorized to take possession of the fortresses, vessels, public stores and property of every description ; to dispose of all offices ; and to command whatever persons he might deem expedient for the tranquillity of the island, without distinction of rank, to return to Spain, and present themselves before the sovereigns. Such, in brief, was the sum of the extraordinary powers intrusted to Bobadilla.*

It is impossible now to determine what motives could have led to the selection of so incompetent an agent for an office of such high responsibility. He seems to have been a weak and arrogant man, swelled up with unmeasurable insolence by the brief authority thus undeservedly bestowed on him. From the very first, he regarded Columbus in the light of a convicted criminal, on whom it was his business to execute the sentence of the law. Accordingly, on his arrival at the island, August 23, 1500, after an ostentatious parade of his credentials, he commanded the admiral to appear before him, and, without even affecting the forms of a legal inquiry, at once caused him to be manacled, and thrown into prison. Columbus submitted without the least show of resistance, displaying in this sad reverse that magnanimity of soul which would have touched the heart of a generous adversary. Bobadilla, however, discovered no such sensibility ; and after raking together all the foul or frivolous calumnies which hatred or the hope of favour could extort, he caused the whole loathsome mass of accusation to be sent back to Spain with the admiral, whom he commanded to be kept strictly in irons during the passage ; “ afraid,” says Ferdinand Columbus bitterly, “ lest he might by any chance swim back again to the island.” *

* Navarrete, Viages y Descubrimientos, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. 127—130.—The original commission to Bobadilla was dated March 21, and May 21, 1499 ; the execution of it, however, was delayed until July 1500, in the hope, doubtless, of obtaining such tidings from Hispaniola as should obviate the necessity of a measure so prejudicial to the admiral.

This excess of malice served, as usual, however, to defeat itself. So enormous an outrage shocked the minds of those most prejudiced against Columbus. All seemed to feel it as a national dishonour that such indignities should be heaped on the man who, whatever might be his indiscretions, had done so much for Spain and the whole civilized world ; a man who, in the honest language of an old writer, “ had he lived in the days of ancient Greece or Rome, would have had statues raised, and temples and divine honours dedicated to him, as to a divinity !” †

None partook of the general indignation more

* Colon, Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxvi. — Garibay, Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. vii. — Pet. Martyr, De Reb Oceanicis, Dec. i. lib. vii. — Gomara, Hist. de las Indias, cap. xxiii. — Herrera, Hist. de las Indias, lib. iv. cap. x. — Benzoni, Novi Orbis Hist. lib. i. cap. xii.

† Benzoni, Nov. Orb. His-

toriæ, lib. i. c. xii. — Herrera, Hist. General, lib. vi. cap. xv.

Ferdinand Columbus tells us, that his father kept the fetters in which he was brought home, hanging up in an apartment of his house, as a perpetual memorial of national ingratitude ; and, when he died, ordered them to be buried in the same grave with himself. Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxvi.

strongly than Ferdinand and Isabella, who, in addition to their personal feelings of disgust at so gross an act, readily comprehended the whole weight of obloquy which its perpetration must necessarily attach to them. They sent to Cadiz without an instant's delay, and commanded the admiral to be released from his ignominious fetters. They wrote to him in the most benignant terms, expressing their sincere regret for the unworthy usage he had experienced, and requesting him to appear before them as speedily as possible, at Granada, where the court was then staying. At the same time, they furnished him a thousand ducats for his expenses, and a handsome retinue to escort him on his journey.

Columbus, revived by these assurances of the kind dispositions of his sovereigns, proceeded without delay to Granada, which he reached on the 17th of December 1500. Immediately on his arrival he obtained an audience. The queen could not repress her tears at the sight of the man whose illustrious services had met with such ungenerous requital, as it were, at her own hands. She endeavoured to cheer his wounded spirit with the most earnest assurances of her sympathy and sorrow for his misfortunes. Columbus, from the first moment of his disgrace, had relied on the good faith and kindness of Isabella ; for, as an ancient Castilian writer remarks, " she had ever^e favoured him beyond the king her husband, protecting his interests, and showing him especial kindness and good-will." When he beheld the emotion of his royal mistress, and listened to her consolatory language, it was too much for his loyal and generous heart, and, throwing himself on his knees, he gave vent to his feelings, and sobbed aloud. The sovereigns endeavoured to soothe and tranquilize his mind, and, after testifying their deep sense of his injuries, promised him that impartial justice should be done his enemies, and that he should be reinstated in his emoluments and honours.*

Much censure has attached to the Spanish government for its share in this unfortunate transaction, both in the appointment of so unsuitable an agent as Bobadilla, and the delegation of such broad and indefinite powers. With regard to the first, it is now too late, as has already been remarked, to ascertain on what grounds such a selection could have been made. There is no evidence of his being indebted for his promotion to intrigue or any undue influence. Indeed, according to the testimony of one of his contemporaries, he was reputed “an extremely honest and religious man,” and the good bishop Las Casas expressly declares that “no imputation of dishonesty or avarice had ever rested on his character.”† It was an error of judgment; a grave one, indeed, and must pass for as much as it is worth.

* Garibay, Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. vii. — Pet. Martyr, De Rebus Oceanicis, Dec. i. lib. vii. — F. Colon, Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxvi. lxxxvii. — Herrera, Hist. Gener. de las Indias, Dec. i. lib.

iv. cap. viii—x. — Benzoni, Nov. Orbis Historiæ, lib. i. cap. xii.

† Oviedo, Hist. Gen. de las Ind. P. i. lib. iii. cap. vi. — Las Casas, lib. ii. cap. vi. apud Navarrete, tom. i. Introd. p. 99.

But in regard to the second charge, of delegating unwarrantable powers, it should be remembered that the grievances of the colony were represented as of a most pressing nature, demanding a prompt and peremptory remedy ; that a more limited and partial authority, dependent for its exercise on instructions from the government at home, might be attended with ruinous delays ; that this authority must necessarily be paramount to that of Columbus, who was a party implicated ; and that, although unlimited jurisdiction was given over all offences committed against him, yet neither he nor his friends were to be molested in any other way than by temporary suspension from office, and a return to their own country, where the merits of their case might be submitted to the sovereigns themselves.

This view of the matter, indeed, is perfectly conformable to that of Ferdinand Columbus, whose solicitude, so apparent in every page, for his father's reputation, must have effectually counterbalanced any repugnance he may have felt at impugning the conduct of his sovereigns. " The only ground of complaint," he remarks, in summing up his narrative of the transaction, " which I can bring against their Catholic highnesses, is the unfitness of the agent whom they employed, equally malicious and ignorant. Had they sent out a suitable person, the admiral would have been highly gratified, since he had more than once requested the appointment of some one with full powers of jurisdiction in an affair where he felt some natural delicacy in moving, in consequence of his own brother having been originally involved in it." And as to the vast magnitude of the powers intrusted to Bobadilla, he adds, " it can scarcely be wondered at, considering the manifold complaints against the admiral made to their highnesses."*

Although the king and queen determined without hesitation on the complete restoration of the admiral's honours, they thought it better to defer his re-appointment to the government of the colony until the present disturbances should be settled, and he might return there with personal safety and advantage. In the mean time, they resolved to send out a competent individual, and to support him with such a force as should overawe faction, and enable him to place the tranquillity of the island on a permanent basis.

The person selected was Don Nicolas de Ovando, comendador of Lares, of the military order of Alcantara. He was a man of acknowledged prudence and sagacity, temperate in his habits, and plausible and politic in his address. It is sufficient evidence of his standing at the court, that he had been one of the ten youths selected to be educated in the palace as companions for the Prince of Asturias. He was furnished with a fleet of two-and-thirty sail, carrying twenty-five hundred persons, many of them of the best families in the kingdom, with every variety of article for the nourishment and permanent prosperity of the colony ; and the general equipment was in a style of expense and magnificence such as had never before been lavished on any armada destined for the western waters.*

* F. Colon, Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxvi.

September 1501. The new governor was instructed immediately on his arrival to send Bobadilla home for trial. Under his lax administration abuses of every kind had multiplied to an alarming extent ; and the poor natives, in particular, were rapidly wasting away under the new and most inhuman arrangement of the repartimientos which he established. Isabella now declared the Indians free ; and emphatically enjoined on the authorities of Hispaniola to respect them as true and faithful vassals of the crown. Ovando was especially to ascertain the amount of losses sustained by Columbus and his brothers, to provide for their full indemnification, and to secure the unmolested enjoyment in future of all their lawful rights and pecuniary perquisites.†

Fortified with the most ample instructions in regard to these and other details of his administration, the governor embarked on board his magnificent flotilla, and crossed the bar of St. Lucar, February 15, 1502. A furious tempest dispersed the fleet before it had been out a week, and a report reached Spain that it had entirely perished. The sovereigns, overwhelmed with sorrow at this fresh disaster, which consigned so many of their best and bravest to a watery grave, shut themselves up in their palace for several days. Fortunately, the report proved ill-founded. The fleet rode out the storm in safety, one vessel only having perished, and the remainder reached in due time its place of destination.*

* Herrera, Hist. General de las Ind. Dec. i. lib. iv. cap. xi.—Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxvii.—Benzoni, N. Orbis Hist. lib. i. cap. xii.—Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. p. 385.

† Herrera, Hist. de las Indias, lib. iv. c. xi—xiii.—Navarrete, Viages y Descubrimientos, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 138. 144.—Hist. del Almirante, c. lxxxvii.

The Spanish government has been roundly taxed with injustice and ingratitude for its delay in restoring Columbus to the full possession of his colonial authority, and that too by writers generally distinguished for candour and impartiality. No such animadversion, however, as far as I am aware, is countenanced by contemporary historians; and it appears to be wholly undeserved. Independent of the obvious inexpediency of returning him immediately to the theatre of disaffection before the embers of ancient animosity had had time to cool, there were several features of his character which make it doubtful whether he were the most competent person, in any event, for an emergency demanding at once the greatest coolness, consummate address, and acknowledged personal authority. His sublime enthusiasm, which carried him victorious over every obstacle, involved him also in numerous embarrassments, which men of more phlegmatic temperament would have escaped. It led him to count too readily on a similar spirit in others, and to be disappointed. It gave an exaggerated colouring to his views and descriptions, that inevitably led to a reaction in the minds of such as embarked their all on the splendid dreams of a fairy land, which they were never to realize.* Hence a fruitful source of discontent and disaffection in his followers. It led him, in his eagerness for the achievement of his great enterprises, to be less scrupulous and politic as to the means than a less ardent spirit would have been. His pertinacious adherence to the scheme of Indian slavery, and his impolitic regulation compelling the labour of the hidalgos, are pertinent examples of this.† He was, moreover, a foreigner, without rank,

* Herrera, Hist. de las Indias, lib. v. cap. i.

* The high devotional feeling of Columbus led him to trace out allusions in Scripture to the various circumstances and scenes of his adventurous life. Thus, he believed his great discovery announced in the Apocalypse, and Isaiah; he identified, as I have before stated, the mines of Hispaniola with the golden quarries which furnished Solomon with the materials for his temple; he fancied that he had determined the actual locality of the garden of Eden in the newly discovered region of Paria: but his greatest extravagance was his project of a crusade for the recovery of the holy sepulchre. This he cherished from the first hour of his discovery, pressing it in the most urgent manner on the sovereigns, and making actual provision for it in his testament. This was a flight, however, beyond the spirit even of this romantic age, and probably received as little serious attention from the queen, as from her more cool and calculating husband. Pet. Martyr, De Reb. Oceanicis, Dec. i. lib. vi.—Ter- cer Viage de Colon, ap. Navarrete, tom. i. p. 259; tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 140.—Herrera, lib. vi. cap. xv.

† Another example was the injudicious punishment of delinquents by diminishing their regular allowance of food, a measure so obnoxious as to call for the interference of the sovereigns, who prohibited it altogether. (Navarrete, Viages, &c. tom. ii. Doc. Dip. 97.) Herrera, who must be admitted to have been in no degree insensible to the merits of Columbus, closes his account of the various accusations urged against him and his brothers, with the remark that, “with every allowance for calumny, they must be confessed fortune, or powerful friends ; and his high and sudden elevation naturally raised up a thousand enemies among a proud, punctilious, and intensely national people. Under these multiplied embarrassments, resulting from peculiarities of character and situation, the sovereigns might well be excused for not intrusting Columbus, at this delicate crisis, with disentangling the mesh of intrigue and faction in which the affairs of the colony were so unhappily involved.

I trust these remarks will not be construed into an insensibility to the merits and exalted services of Columbus. “A world,” to borrow the words, though not the application of the Greek historian, “is his monument.” His virtues shine with too bright a lustre to be dimmed by a few natural blemishes ; but it becomes necessary to notice these, to vindicate the Spanish government from the imputation of perfidy and ingratitude, where it has been most freely urged, and apparently with the least foundation.

It is more difficult to excuse the paltry equipment with which the admiral was suffered to undertake his fourth and last voyage. The object proposed by this expedition was the discovery of a passage to the great Indian ocean, which he inferred—sagaciously enough from his premises, though, as it turned out, to the great inconvenience of the commercial world, most erroneously,—must open somewhere be-not to have governed the Castilians with the moderation that they ought to have done.” Hist. General, lib. iv. c. ix.

tween Cuba and the coast of Paria. Four caravels, only, were furnished for the expedition, the largest of which did not exceed seventy tons burthen; a force forming a striking contrast to the magnificent armada lately intrusted to Ovando, and altogether too insignificant to be vindicated on the ground of the different objects proposed by the two expeditions.*

Columbus, oppressed with growing infirmities and a consciousness, perhaps, of the decline of popular favour, manifested unusual despondency previous to his embarkation. He talked, even, of resigning the task of further discovery to his brother Bartholomew. "I have established," said he, "all that I proposed,—the existence of land beyond the West. I have opened the gate, and others may enter in at their pleasure; as indeed they do, arrogating to themselves the title of discoverers, to which they can have little claim, following as they do in my track." He little thought the ingratitude of mankind would sanction the claims of these adventurers so far as to confer the name of one of the least of them on the whole of that world which his genius had revealed.†

* Garibay, Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xiv.—Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxviii.—Herrera, Indias Occidentales, lib. v. cap. i. — Benzonì, Nov. Orbis Hist. cap. xiv.

† It would be going out of our way to investigate the pretensions of Amerigo Vespucci to the honour of first discovering the South American continent. The English reader will find them discussed with great perspicuity and candour by Mr. Irving, in his 'Life of Columbus,' (Appendix, No. 9). Few will be disposed to contest the author's conclusion respecting their fallacy, though all may not have the same charity with himself

The great inclination, however, which the admiral had to serve the Catholic sovereigns, and especially the most serene queen, says Ferdinand Columbus, induced him to lay aside his scruples and encounter the perils and fatigues of another voyage. A few weeks before his departure he received a gracious letter from Ferdinand and Isabella, the last ever addressed to him by his royal mistress, assuring him of their purpose to maintain inviolate all their engagements with him, and to perpetuate the inheritance of his honours in his family.* Comforted and cheerin tracing its possible origin to an editorial blunder, instead of wilful fabrication on the part of Vespucci; in which light, indeed, it seems to have been regarded by the two most ancient and honest historians of the event, Las Casas and Herrera. There is no reason to suspect him, however, of pretending to anything beyond the discovery of Paria, or of anticipating in any degree the important consequence destined to result from such pretensions.

Since the appearance of Mr. Irving's work, Señor Navarrete has published his third volume of 'Coleccion de Viages y Descubrimientos,' &c. containing among other things the original letters recording Vespucci's American voyages, illustrated by all the authorities and facts that could come within the scope of his indefatigable researches. The whole mass of testimony leads irresistibly to the conclusion, that Columbus is entitled to the glory of being the original discoverer of the southern continent, as well as islands of the western hemisphere. Coleccion, tom. iii. pp. 183—334.

The character and claims of Vespucci are discussed with much ingenuity and careful examination of authorities, by Mr. Cushing, in his 'Reminiscences of Spain,' (vol. ii. pp. 210, et seq.) The author's conclusions, which leave the vexed question of priority of discovery unsettled, are altogether favourable to the integrity of the Florentine.

* Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxvii. — Herrera notices this letter, written, he says, "con tanta humanidad, que parecia extraordinaria de lo que usavan con otros, y no sin razon, pues jamas nadie les hizo tal servicio." Hist. de las Ind. lib. v. cap. i.

Among other instances of the queen's personal regard for Columbus, may be noticed her receiving his two sons, Diego and ed by these assurances, the veteran navigator, quitting the port of Cadiz on the 9th of March 1502, once more spread his sails for those golden regions, which he had approached so near, but was destined never to reach.

It will not be necessary to pursue his course further than to notice a single occurrence of most extraordinary nature. The admiral had received instructions not to touch at Hispaniola on his outward voyage. The leaky condition of one of his ships, however, and the signs of an approaching storm, induced him to seek a temporary refuge there; at the same time, he counselled Ovando to delay for a few days the departure of the fleet, then riding in the harbour, which was destined to carry Bobadilla and the rebels, with their ill-gotten treasures, back to Spain. The churlish governor, however, not only refused Columbus admittance, but gave orders for the instant departure of the vessels. The apprehensions of the experienced mariner were fully justified by the event. Scarcely had the Spanish fleet quitted its moorings, before one of those tremendous hurricanes came on which so often desolate these tropical regions, sweeping down every thing before it, and fell with such violence on the little navy, that out of eighteen ships, of which it was composed, not more than three or four escaped. The rest all foundered, including those which contained Bobadilla and the late enemies of Columbus. Two hundred thousand castellanos of gold, half of which belonged to the government, went to the bottom with them. The only one of the fleet which made its way back to Spain was a crazy little bark, which contained the admiral's property, amounting to four thousand ounces of gold. To complete these curious coincidences, Columbus with his little squadron rode out the storm in safety under the lee of the island, where he had prudently taken shelter on being so rudely repulsed from the port. This even-handed retribution of justice, so uncommon in human affairs, led many to discern the immediate interposition of Providence. Others, in a less Christian temper, referred it all to the necromancy of the admiral.*

Fernando, as her own pages, on the death of Prince John, in whose service they had formerly been. (Navarrete, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. 125.)

By an ordinance of 1503, we find Diego Colon made continuo of the royal household, with an annual salary of 50,000 maravedis. Idem, Doc. Dipl. No. 150.

* Pet. Martyr, De Rebus Oceanicis, Dec. i. lib. x.—Garibay, Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xiv.—Hist.

del Almirante, cap. lxxxviii.—
Benzoni, Nov. Orb. Hist. cap.
xii.—Herrera, Hist. Gen. de las Indias, lib. v. cap. ii.

CHAPTER IX.

SPANISH COLONIAL POLICY.

A CONSIDERATION of the colonial policy pursued during Isabella's lifetime has been hitherto deferred, in order not to break the narrative of Columbus's personal adventures. I shall now endeavour to present the reader with a brief outline of it, as far as can be collected from imperfect and scanty materials; for, however incomplete in itself, it becomes important as containing the germ of the gigantic system developed in later ages.

Ferdinand and Isabella manifested from the first an eager and enlightened curiosity in reference to their new acquisitions, constantly interrogating the admiral minutely as to their soil, climate, their various vegetable and mineral products, and especially the character of the uncivilized races who inhabited them. They paid the greatest deference to his suggestions, as before remarked; and liberally supplied the infant settlement with whatever could contribute to its nourishment and permanent prosperity.* Through their provident attention, in a very few years after its discovery, the island of Hispaniola was in possession of the most important domestic animals, as well as fruits and vegetables, of the Old World, some of which have since continued to furnish the staple of a far more lucrative commerce than was ever anticipated from its gold mines.*

* See, in particular, a letter to Columbus, dated August 1494; (ap. Navarrete, Viages, &c. tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 79.) also an

Emigration to the new countries was encouraged by the liberal tenor of the royal ordinances passed from time to time. The settlers in Hispaniola were to have their passage free; to be excused from taxes; to have the fee of such plantations on the island as they should engage to cultivate for four years; and they were furnished with a gratuitous supply of grain and stock for their farms. All exports and imports were exempted from duty, affording a striking contrast to the narrow policy of later ages. Five hundred persons, including scientific men and artisans of every description, were sent out and maintained at the expense of government. In order to provide for the greater security and quiet of the island, Ovando was authorized to gather the resi-elaborate memorial presented by the admiral in the same year, setting forth the various necessities of the colony, every item of which is particularly answered by the sovereigns in a manner showing how attentively they considered his suggestions. — Ibid. tom. i. pp. 226—241.

* Abundant evidence of this is furnished by the long enumeration of articles subjected to tithes, contained in an ordinance dated October 5th, 1501, showing with what indiscriminate severity this heavy burden was imposed from the first on the most important products of human industry. Recopilacion de Leyes de las Indias, tom. i. lib. i. tit. xvi. ley ii.

dents into towns, which were endowed with the privileges appertaining to similar corporations in the mother country; and a number of married men with their families were encouraged to establish themselves in them, with the view of giving greater solidity and permanence to the settlement.*

With these wise provisions were mingled others savouring too strongly of the illiberal spirit of the age. Such were those prohibiting Jews, Moors, or indeed any but Castilians, for whom the discovery was considered exclusively to have been made, from inhabiting, or even visiting, the New World. The government kept a most jealous eye upon what it regarded as its own peculiar perquisites, reserving to itself the exclusive possession of all minerals, dye-woods, and precious stones, that should be discovered; and, although private persons were allowed to search for gold, they were subjected to the exorbitant tax of two-thirds, subsequently reduced to one-fifth, of all they should obtain, for the crown.†

The measure which contributed more effectually than any other, at this period, to the progress of discovery and colonization, was the license granted un-

* Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 86. April 10th, 1495. — Nos. 103. 105—108. April 23rd, 1497. — No. 110. May 6th, 1497. — No. 121. July 22nd, 1497. — Herrera, Hist. General de las Indias, Dec. i. lib. iv. cap. xii.

† Navarrete, Viages y Descubrimientos, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl.

Nos. 86. 121. — Herrera, Hist. General, lib. iii. cap. ii. — Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. v. sec. xxxiv.

The exclusion of foreigners, at least all but “Catholic Christians,” is particularly recommended by Columbus in his first communication to the crown. Primer Viage de Colon.

der certain regulations, in 1495, for voyages undertaken by private individuals. No use was made of this permission until some years later, 1499. The spirit of enterprise had flagged, and the nation had experienced something like disappointment on contrasting the meagre results of their own discoveries with the dazzling successes of the Portuguese, who had struck at once into the very heart of the golden East. The reports of the admiral's third voyage, however, and the beautiful specimens of pearls which he sent home from the coast of Paria, revived the cupidity of the nation. Private adventurers now proposed to avail themselves of the license already granted, and to follow up the track of discovery on their own account. The government, drained by its late heavy expenditures, and jealous of the spirit of maritime adventure beginning to show itself in the other nations of Europe,* willingly acquiesced in a measure which, while it opened a wide field of enterprise for its subjects, secured to itself all the substantial benefits of discovery, without any of the burdens.

The ships fitted out under the general license were required to reserve one-tenth of their tonnage for the crown, as well as two-thirds of all the gold, and ten per cent. of all other commodities, which they should procure. The government promoted

* Among the foreign adventurers were the two Cabots, who sailed in the service of the English monarch, Henry VII, 1497, and ran down the whole coast of these expeditions by a bounty on all vessels of six hundred tons and upwards, engaged in them.*

North America, from Newfoundland to within a few degrees of Florida, thus encroaching as it were on the very field of discovery preoccupied by the Spaniards.

With this encouragement the more wealthy merchants of Seville, Cadiz, and Palos, the old theatre of nautical enterprise, freighted and sent out little squadrons of three or four vessels each, which they intrusted to the experienced mariners who had accompanied Columbus in his first voyage, or since followed in his footsteps. They held in general the same course pursued by the admiral on his last expedition, exploring the coasts of the great southern continent. Some of the adventurers returned with such rich freights of gold, pearls, and other precious commodities, as well compensated the fatigues and perils of the voyage; but the greater number were obliged to content themselves with the more enduring, but barren honours of discovery.†

* Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, lib. v. sec. xxxii. — Navarrete, Viages y Descubr. Doc. Dipl. No. 86.

† Columbus seems to have taken exceptions at the license for private voyages, as an infringement of his own prerogatives: it is difficult to understand in what way, however. There is nothing in his original capitulations with the government having reference to the matter, (see Doc. Dipl. No. 5,) while, in the letters patent made out previous to his second voyage, the right of granting licenses is expressly reserved to the crown, and to the superintendant Fonseca, equally with the admiral. (Doc. Dipl. No. 35.) The only legal claim which he could make in all such expeditions as were not conducted under him, was to one-eighth of the tonnage, and this was regularly provided for in the general license. (Doc. Dipl. No. 86.) The sovereigns, indeed, in consequence of his remonstrances, published an ordinance, June 2, 1497, in which, after expressing their unabated respect for all the rights and privileges of the admiral, they declare that whatever shall be found in their previous license repugnant to these shall be null and void. (Doc. Dipl. 113.) The hypothetical form in which this is stated shows that the

The active spirit of enterprise now awakened, and the more enlarged commercial relations with the new colonies, required a more perfect organisation of the department for Indian affairs, the earliest vestiges of which have been already noticed in a preceding chapter.* By an ordinance dated at Alcala, Jan. 20th, 1503, it was provided that a board should be established consisting of three functionaries, with the titles of treasurer, factor, and comptroller. Their permanent residence was assigned in the old alcazar of Seville, where they were to meet together every day for the despatch of business. The board was expected to make itself thoroughly acquainted with whatever concerned the colonies, and to afford the government all information that could be obtained affecting their interests and commercial prosperity. It was empowered to grant licenses under the regular conditions, to provide for the equipment of fleets, to determine their destination, and furnish them instructions, on sailing. All merchandise for exportation was to be deposited in the alcazar, where the return cargoes were to be received, and contracts made for their sale. Similar authority was given to it over the trade with the Barbary coast, and the Canary islands. Its supervision was to extend in like manner over all vessels which might take their sovereigns, with an honest desire of keeping their engagements with Columbus, had not a very clear perception in what manner they had been violated.

Martyr, De Rebus Oceanicis,

Dec. i. lib. ix.—Herrera, Hist. Gen. de las Indias, lib. iv. cap. xi.—Benzoni, Nov. Orbis Hist. cap. xiii.

* Part i. chap. xviii. of this History.

departure from the port of Cadiz, as well as from Seville. With these powers were combined others of a purely judicial character, authorizing them to take cognisance of questions arising out of particular voyages, and of the colonial trade in general. In this latter capacity they were to be assisted by the advice of two jurists, maintained by a regular salary from the government.*

Such were the extensive powers intrusted to the famous casa de contratacion, or house of trade, on this its first definite organisation; and although its authority was subsequently somewhat circumscribed by the appellant jurisdiction of the council of the Indies, it has always continued the great organ by which the commercial transactions with the colonies have been conducted and controlled.

The Spanish government, while thus securing to itself the more easy and exclusive management of the colonial trade, by confining it within one narrow channel, discovered the most admirable foresight in providing for its absolute supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs, where alone it could be contested. By a bull of Alexander VI, dated November 16th, 1501, the sovereigns were empowered to receive all the tithes in the colonial dominions.† Another bull

* Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. 148.—Solorzano y Pereyra, Politica Indiana; ed. Madrid, 1776, lib. vi. cap. xvii.—Linage, Norte de la Contratacion de las Indias Occ. lib. i. cap. i.; ed. Sevilla, 1672.—Zuñiga, Anales de Sevilla, año 1503.—Herrera, Hist. de las Ind. lib. v. cap. xii.—Navagiero, Viaggio, fol. 15.

† See the original bull, ap. Navarrete, tom. ii. Apend. xiv. and a Spanish version of it, in Solorzano, Politica Indiana, lib. iv. cap. i. sec. vii.

of Pope Julius II, July 28th, 1508, granted them the right of collating to all benefices of whatever description in the colonies, subject only to the approbation of the holy see. By these two concessions the Spanish crown was placed at once at the head of the church in its Transatlantic dominions, with the absolute disposal of all its dignities and emoluments.*

It has excited the admiration of more than one historian, that Ferdinand and Isabella, with their reverence for the Catholic church, should have had the courage to assume an attitude of such entire independence of its spiritual chief.† But whoever has studied their reign will regard this measure as perfectly conformable to their habitual policy, which never suffered a zeal for religion, or a blind deference to the church, to compromise in any degree the independence of the crown. It is much more astonishing that pontiffs could be found content to divest themselves of such important prerogatives. It was deviating widely from the subtle and tenacious spirit of their predecessors; and, as the consequences came to be more fully disclosed, furnished ample subject of regret to those who succeeded them.

Such is a brief summary of the principal regulations adopted by Ferdinand and Isabella for the administration of the colonies. Many of their peculiarities, including most of their defects, are to be referred to the peculiar circumstances under which the discovery of the New World was effected. Unlike the settlements on the comparatively sterile shores of North America, which were permitted to devise laws accommodated to their necessities, and to gather strength in the habitual exercise of political functions, the Spanish colonies were from the very first checked and controlled by the over-legislation of the parent country. The original project of discovery had been entered into with indefinite expectations of gain. The verification of Columbus's theory of the existence of land in the West gave popular credit to his conjecture that that land was the far-famed Indies. The specimens of gold, and other precious commodities found there, served to maintain the delusion. The Spanish government regarded the expedition as its own private adventure, to whose benefits it had exclusive pretensions. Hence those jealous regulations for securing to itself a monopoly of the most obvious sources of profit, the dye-woods and the precious metals.

* Solorzano, Polit. Ind. tom. ii. lib. iv. cap. ii. sec. ix.—Informe de Don Agustin Riol, ap. Sem. Erudito, tom. iii. pp. 160, 161.

† Among others see Raynal, Indies, Eng. trans. vol. iv. p. 277.—Robertson's America, vol. iii. p. 283; 7th edit.

These impolitic provisions are relieved by others better suited to the permanent interests of the colony. Such was the bounty offered in various ways on the occupation and culture of land; the erection of municipalities; the right of intercolonial traffic, and of exporting and importing merchandise of every description free of duty.* These and similar laws show that the government, far from regarding the colonies merely as a foreign acquisition to be sacrificed to the interests of the mother country, as at a later period, was disposed to legislate for them on more generous principles, as an integral portion of the monarchy.

* Muñoz, Nuevo Mundo, lib. v. sec. xxxii. xxxiii.—Her-

Some of the measures, even of a less liberal tenor, may be excused, as sufficiently accommodated to existing circumstances. No regulation, for example, was found eventually more mischievous in its operation than that which confined the colonial trade to the single port of Seville, instead of permitting it to find a free vent in the thousand avenues naturally opened in every part of the kingdom; to say nothing of the grievous monopolies and exactions for which this concentration of a mighty traffic on so small a point was found, in later times, to afford unbounded facility: but the colonial trade was too limited in its extent, under Ferdinand and Isabella, to involve such consequences. It was chiefly confined to a few wealthy seaports of Andalusia, from whose vicinity the first adventurers had sallied forth on their career of discovery. It was no inconvenience to them to have a common port of entry so central and accessible as Seville, which, moreover, by this arrangement became a great mart for European trade; thus affording a convenient market to the country for effecting its commercial exchanges with every quarter of Christendom.* It was only when laws adapted to the incipient stages of commerce were perpetuated to a period when that commerce had swelled to such gigantic dimensions as to embrace every quarter of the empire, that their gross impolicy became manifest.

It would not be giving a fair view of the great objects proposed by the Spanish sovereigns in their schemes of discovery, to omit one paramount to all the rest, with the queen at least,—the propagation of Christianity among the heathen. The conversion and civilization of this simple people form, as has been already said, the burden of most of her official communications from the earliest period.† She neglected no means for the furtherance of this good work, through the agency of missionaries exclusively devoted to it, who were to establish their residence among the natives, and win them to the true faith by their instructions, and the edifying example of their own lives. It was with the design of ameliorating the condition of the natives, that she sanctioned the introduction into the colonies of negro slaves born in Spain, (1501.) This she did on the repre-

* The historian of Seville mentions that it was the resort especially of the merchants of Flanders, with whom a more intimate intercourse had been opened by the intermarriages of the royal family with the house of Burgundy. See Anales Seculares y Ecclesiasticos de Sevilla, p. 415.

† Navarrete, tom. ii. Doc. Dip. No. 45, et loc. al.—Las Casas, amidst his unsparing condemnation of the guilty, does ample justice to the pure and generous, though, alas! unavailing efforts of the queen. See Œuvres, tom. i. pp. 21. 307. 395, et alibi.

sensation that the physical constitution of the African was much better fitted than that of the Indian to endure severe toil under a tropical climate. To this false principle of economizing human suffering, we are indebted for that foul stain on the New World, which has grown deeper and darker with the lapse of years.*

Isabella, however, was destined to have her benevolent designs in regard to the natives defeated by her own subjects. The popular doctrine of the absolute rights of the Christian over the heathen, seemed to warrant the exaction of labour from these unhappy beings to any degree which avarice on the one hand could demand, or human endurance concede on the other. The device of the repartimientos systematized and completed the whole scheme of oppression. The queen, it is true, abolished them under Ovando's administration, and declared the Indians "as free as her own subjects."† But his representation, that the Indians, when no longer com-

* Herrera, Hist. General de las Ind. lib. iv. c. xii.—A good account of the introduction of negro slavery into the New World, comprehending the material facts, and some little known, may be found in the fifth chapter of Bancroft's History of the United States; a work in which the author has shown singular address in creating a unity of interest out of a subject which, in its early stages, would seem to want every other unity. It is the deficiency of this, probably, which has prevented Mr. Graham's valuable history from attaining the popularity to which its solid merits justly entitle it. Should the remaining volumes of Mr. Bancroft's work be conducted with equal spirit, scholarship, and impartiality with the volume before us, it cannot fail to take a permanent rank in American literature.

† Herrera, lib. iv. c. xi.

pelled to work, withdrew from all intercourse with the Christians, thus annihilating at once all hopes of their conversion, subsequently induced her to consent that they should be required to labour moderately, and for a reasonable compensation.* This was construed with their usual latitude by the Spaniards, who soon revived the old system of distribution on so terrific a scale, that a letter of Columbus, written shortly after Isabella's death, represents more than six-sevenths of the whole population of Hispaniola to have melted away under it!† The queen was too far removed to enforce the execution of her own beneficent measures, nor is it probable that she ever imagined the extent of their violation, for there was no intrepid philanthropist, in that day, like Las Casas, to proclaim to the world the wrongs and sorrows of the Indian.‡ A conviction, however, of the

* Dec. 20th, 1503.—Herrera, lib. v. c. xi.—See the instructions to Ovando in Navarrete, (tom. ii. Doc. Dip. No. 153.) “Pay them regular wages,” says the ordinance, “for their labour,” “como personas libres como lo son, y no como siervos.” Las Casas, who analyses these instructions, — which Llorente, by the bye, has misdated, — exposes the atrocious manner in which they were violated, in every particular, by Ovando and his successors. Œuvres, tom. i. p. 309, et seq.

† Ibid. ubi supra.—Las Casas, Hist. Ind. lib. ii. c. xxxvi.

MS. ap. Irving, vol. iii. p. 412. —The venerable bishop confirms this frightful picture of desolation, in its full extent, in his various memorials prepared for the council of the Indies. Œuvres, tom. i. passim.

‡ Las Casas made his first voyage to the Indies, it is true, in 1498, or at latest 1502, but there is no trace of his taking an active part in denouncing the oppressions of the Spaniards earlier than 1510, when he combined his efforts with those of the Dominican missionaries lately arrived in St. Domingo, in the same good work. It was not until some years later, unworthy treatment of the natives seems to have pressed heavily on her heart ; for in a codicil to her testament, dated a few days only before her death, she invokes the kind offices of her successor in their behalf in such strong and affectionate language, as plainly indicates how intently her thoughts were occupied with their condition down to the last hour of her existence.*

The moral grandeur of the maritime discoveries under this reign must not so far dazzle us, as to lead to a very high estimate of their immediate results in an economical view. Most of those articles which have since formed the great staples of South American commerce, as cocoa, indigo, cochineal, tobacco, &c. were either not known in Isabella's time, or not cultivated for exportation. Small quantities of cotton had been brought to Spain, but it was doubted whether the profit would compensate the expense of raising it. The sugar-cane had been transplanted into Hispaniola, and thrived luxuriantly in its genial soil ; but it required time to grow it to any considerable amount as an article of commerce, and this was still further delayed by the distractions as well as avarice of the colony, which grasped at nothing less substantial than gold itself. The only vegetable product extensively used in trade was the Brazil-wood,

1515, that he returned to Spain and pleaded the cause of the injured natives before the throne. Llorente, Œuvres de Barthélemy de las Casas, tom. i. pp. 1—whose beautiful dye and application to various ornamental purposes made it from the first one of the most important monopolies of the crown.

23.—Nic. Antonio, Bib. Nova, tom. i. pp. 191, 192.

* See the will, apud Dormer, Discursos Varios de Historia, p. 381.

The accounts are too vague to afford any probable estimate of the precious metals obtained from the new territories previous to Ovando's mission. Before the discovery of the mines of Hayna it was certainly very inconsiderable. The size of some of the specimens of ore found there would suggest magnificent ideas of their opulence. One piece of gold is reported by the contemporary historians to have weighed 3200 castellanos, and to have been so large that the Spaniards served up a roasted pig on it, boasting that no potentate in Europe could dine off so costly a dish.* The admiral's own statement, that the miners obtained from six gold castellanos to one hundred or even two hundred and fifty in a day, allows a latitude too great to lead to any definite conclusion.† More tangible evidence of the riches of the island is afforded by the fact, that 200,000 castellanos of gold went down in the ships with Bobadilla : but this, it must be remembered, was the fruit of gigantic efforts, continued under a system of unexampled oppression for more than two years. To this testimony might be added that of the well-informed historian of Seville, who infers from several lxxxiv. ap. Barcia, Historiadores Primitivos, tom. i.

* Herrera, Hist. Gen. de las Indias, lib. v. cap. i.—Hist. del Almirante, cap. lxxxiv.—Oviedo, Relacion Sumaria de la Hist. Natur. de las Indias, cap.

† Tercer Viage de Colon, ap. Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. i. p. 274.

royal ordinances, that the influx of the precious metals had been such, before the close of the fifteenth century, as to affect the value of the currency, and the regular prices of commodities.* These large estimates, however, are scarcely reconcilable with the popular discontent at the meagreness of the returns obtained from the New World, or with the assertion of Bernaldez, of the same date with Zuñiga's reference, that "so little gold had been brought home as to raise a general belief that there was scarcely any in the island."† This is still further confirmed by the frequent representations of contemporary writers, that the expenses of the colonies considerably exceeded the profits; and may account for the very limited scale on which the Spanish government, at no time blind to its own interests, pursued its schemes of discovery, as compared with its Portuguese neighbours, who followed up theirs with a magnificent apparatus of fleets and armies that could have been supported only by the teeming treasures of the Indies.‡

* Zuñiga, Anales, p. 415.

The alteration was in the gold currency, which continued to rise in value till 1497, when it gradually sunk, in consequence of the importation from the mines of Hispaniola. Clemencin has given its relative value as compared with silver, for several different years, and the year he assigns for the commencement of its depreciation, is precisely the same with that indicated by Zuñiga. (Mem.

de Real Acad. tom. vi. Plust. xx.) The value of silver was not materially affected till the discovery of the great mines of Potosi and Zacatecas.

† Bernaldez, Reyes Catolicos, MS. cap. cxxxi.

‡ The estimates in the text, it will be noticed, apply only to the period antecedent to Ovando's administration, 1502. The operations under him were conducted on a far more extensive and efficient plan. The sys-

While the colonial commerce failed to produce immediately the splendid returns which were expected, it was generally believed to have introduced a physical evil into Europe, which, in the language of an eminent writer, "more than counterbalanced all the benefits that resulted from the discovery of the New World." I allude to the loathsome disease which Heaven has sent as the severest scourge of licentious intercourse between the sexes; and which broke out with all the virulence of an epidemic in almost every quarter of Europe, in a very short time after the discovery of America. The coincidence of these two events led to the popular belief of their connexion with each other, though deriving little support from any other circumstance. The expedition of Charles VIII. against Naples, which brought the Spaniards, soon after, in immediate contact with the various tem of repartimientos being revived, the whole physical force of the island, aided by the best mechanical apparatus, was employed in extorting from the soil all its hidden stores of wealth. The success was such, that in 1506, within two years after Isabella's death, the four foundries established in the island yielded an annual amount, according to Herrera, of 450,000 ounces of gold. It must be remarked, however, that one-fifth only of the gross sum obtained from the mines was at that time paid to the crown. It is a proof how far these returns exceeded the expectations at the time of Ovando's appointment, that the person then sent out as marker of the gold was to receive, as a reasonable compensation, one per cent. of all the gold assayed. The perquisite, however, was found to be so excessive, that the functionary was recalled, and a new arrangement made with his successor. (See Herrera, Hist. General de las Indias, Dec. i, lib. vi. cap. xviii.) When Navagiero visited Seville, in 1520, the royal fifth of the gold which passed through the mints amounted to about 100,000 ducats annually. Viaggio in Spagna, fol. 15.

nations of Christendom, suggested a plausible medium for the rapid communication of the disorder, and this theory of its origin and transmission gaining credit with time, which made it more difficult to be refuted, has passed with little examination from the mouth of one historian to another to the present day.

The extremely brief interval which elapsed between the return of Columbus and the simultaneous appearance of the disorder at the most distant points of Europe, long since suggested a reasonable distrust of the correctness of the hypothesis ; and an American, naturally desirous of relieving his own country from so melancholy a reproach, may feel satisfaction that the more searching and judicious criticism of our own day has at length established beyond a doubt that the disease, far from originating in the New World, was never known there till introduced by Europeans.*

* The curious reader is particularly referred to a late work, entitled Lettere sulla storia de' Mali Venerei, di Domenico Thiene, Venezia, 1823; in which the author has assembled all the early notices of the disease of any authority, and discussed their import with great integrity and judgment. The following positions may be considered as established by his researches. 1. That neither Columbus nor his son, in their copious narratives and correspondence, allude in any way to the existence of such a disease in the New World. I must add, that an examination of the original documents published by Navarrete since the date of Dr. Thiene's work fully confirms this statement. 2. That among the frequent notices of the disease during the twenty-five years immediately following the discovery of America, there is not a single intimation of its having been brought from that country ; but, on the contrary, an uniform derivation of it from some other source, generally France. 3. That the disorder

Whatever be the amount of physical good or evil immediately resulting to Spain from her new discoveries, their moral consequences were inestimable. The ancient limits of human thought and action were overleaped; the veil which had covered the secrets of the deep for so many centuries was removed; another hemisphere was thrown open; and was known and circumstantially described previous to the expedition of Charles VIII, and of course could not have been introduced by the Spaniards in that way, as vulgarly supposed. 4. That various contemporary authors trace its existence, in a variety of countries, as far back as 1493, and the beginning of 1494; showing a rapidity and extent of diffusion perfectly irreconcilable with its importation by Columbus in 1493. 5. Lastly, that it was not till after the close of Ferdinand and Isabella's reigns, that the first work appeared affecting to trace the origin of the disease to America; and this, published in 1517, was the production, not of a Spaniard, but a foreigner.

A letter of Peter Martyr to the learned Portuguese Arias Barbosa, professor of Greek at Salamanca, noticing the symptoms of the disease in the most unequivocal manner, will settle at once this much-vexed question, if we can rely on the genuineness of the date, the 5th of April 1488, about five years before the return of Columbus. Dr. Thiene, however, rejects the date as apocryphal, on the ground, 1. That the name of 'morbus Gallicus,' given to the disease by Martyr, was not in use till after the French invasion, 1494. 2. That the superscription of Greek professor at Salamanca was premature, as no such professorship existed there till 1508.

As to the first of these objections, it may be remarked that there is but one author prior to the French invasion who notices the disease at all. He derives it from Gaul, though not giving it the technical appellation of morbus Gallicus; and Martyr, it may be observed, far from confining himself to this, alludes to one or two other names, showing that its title was then quite undetermined. In regard to the second objection, Dr. Thiene does not cite his authority for limiting the introduction of Greek at Salamanca to 1508. He may have found a plausible one in the account of that university compiled by one of its officers, Pedro Chacon, 1569, inserted in the eighteenth volume of the Semanario Erudito, Madrid, 1789. The accuracy of the writer's chronology, however, may well be a boundless expansion promised to science from the infinite varieties in which nature was exhibited in these unexplored regions. The success of the Spaniards kindled a generous emulation in their Portuguese rivals, who soon after accomplished their long-sought passage into the Indian seas, and thus completed the great circle of maritime discovery.* It would seem as if Providence had postponed this grand event, until the possession of America, with its stores of precious metals, might supply such materials for a commerce with the East as should bind doubted from a gross anachronism on the same page with the date referred to, where he speaks of Queen Joanna as inheriting the crown in 1512. (Hist. de la Universidad de Salamanca, p. 55.) Waving this, however, the fact of Barbosa being Greek professor at Salamanca in 1488 is directly intimated by his pupil the celebrated Andrew Resendi. "Arius Lusitanus," says he, "quadraginta, et eo plus annos, Salmanticæ tum Latinas literas, tum Græcas, magnâ cum laude professus est." (Responsio ad Quevedum, ap. Barbosa, Bibliotheca Lusitana, tom. i. p. 77.) Now as Barbosa by general consent passed several years in his native country of Portugal, before his death in 1530, this assertion of Resendi necessarily places him at Salamanca in the situation of Greek instructor some time before the date of Martyr's letter. It may be added, indeed, that Nic. Antonio, than whom a more competent critic could not be found, so far from suspecting the date of the letter, cites it as settling the period when Barbosa filled the Greek chair at Salamanca. (See Biblioth. Hisp. Nov. tom. i. p. 170.)

Martyr's epistle, if we admit the genuineness of the date, must dispose at once of the whole question of the American origin of the venereal disease. But as this question is determined quite as conclusively, though not so summarily, by the accumulated evidence from other sources, the reader will probably think the matter not worth so much discussion.

* This event occurred in 1497, Vasco de Gama doubling the Cape of Good Hope, Nov. 20th of that year, and reaching Calicut in the following May, 1498. Clède, Hist. de Portugal, tom. iii. pp. 104—109.

together the most distant quarters of the globe. The impression made on the enlightened minds of that day is evinced by the tone of gratitude and exultation in which they indulge at being permitted to witness the consummation of these glorious events, which their fathers had so long, but in vain, desired to see.*

The discoveries of Columbus occurred most opportunely for the Spanish nation, at the moment when it was released from the tumultuous struggle in which it had been engaged for so many years with the Moslems. The severe schooling of these wars had prepared it for entering on a bolder theatre of action, whose stirring and romantic perils raised still higher the chivalrous spirit of the people. The operation of this spirit was shown in the alacrity with which private adventurers embarked in expeditions to the New World, under cover of the general license, during the last two years of this century. Their efforts, combined with those of Columbus, extended the range of discovery from its original limits, twenty-four degrees north latitude, to probably more than fifteen south, comprehending some of the most important territories in the Western hemisphere. Before the end of 1500, the principal groups of the West India islands had been visited, and the whole extent of the southern continent coasted, from the Bay of Honduras to Cape St. Augustine. One adventurous mariner, indeed, named Lepe, penetrated

* See, among others, Peter Martyr, Opus Epistolarum, ep. 181.

several degrees south of this, to a point not reached by any other voyager for ten or twelve years later. A great part of the kingdom of Brazil was embraced in this extent, and two successive Castilian navigators landed and took formal possession of it for the crown of Castile, previous to its reputed discovery by the Portuguese Cabral;* although the claims to it were subsequently relinquished by the Spanish government, conformably to the famous line of demarcation established by the treaty of Tordesillas.†

While the colonial empire of Spain was thus every day enlarging, the man to whom it was all due was never permitted to know the extent or the value of

* Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. iii. pp. 18—26.—Cabral's pretensions to the discovery of Brazil appear not to have been doubted until recently. They are sanctioned both by Robertson and Raynal.

† The Portuguese court seems to have formed no very accurate idea of the geographical position of Brazil. King Emanuel, in a letter to the Spanish sovereigns acquainting them with Cabral's voyage, speaks of his discovery of Brazil as "most providential, as it was not only convenient but necessary for the navigation to India, affording a proper place for taking in supplies and water!" (See the letter, apud Navarrete, tom. iii. No. 13.) The oldest maps of this country, indeed, whether from ignorance or design, bring it twenty-two degrees east of its proper longitude, so that the whole of the vast tract now comprehended under the name of Brazil would fall on the Portuguese side of the partition line agreed on by the two governments, which, it will be remembered, was removed to 370 leagues west of the Cape de Verdes. The Spanish court made some show at first of resisting the pretensions of the Portuguese, by preparations for establishing a colony on the northern extremity of the Brazilian territory. (Navarrete, tom. iii. p. 39.) It is not easy to understand how it came finally to admit these pretensions. Any correct admeasurement with the Castilian league would only have included the fringe, as it were, of the north-eastern promontory of Brazil. The Portuguese league, allowing seventeen to a degree, may have been adopted, which would embrace nearly the whole it. He died in the conviction in which he lived, that the land he had reached was the long-sought Indies. But it was a country far richer than the Indies; and had he on quitting Cuba struck into a westerly instead of southerly direction, it would have carried him into the very depths of the golden regions whose existence he had so long and vainly predicted. As it was, he 'only opened the gates,' to use his own language, for others more fortunate than himself; and before he quitted Hispaniola for the last time, the young adventurer arrived there, who was destined by the conquest of Mexico to realize all the magnificent visions, which had been derided only as visions in the lifetime of Columbus.

territory which passed under the name of Brazil in the best ancient maps, extending from Para on the north to the great river of San Pedro on the south. (See Malte Brun, book 91.) Mariana seems willing to help the Portuguese, by running the partition line one hundred leagues farther west than they claimed themselves. Hist. de España, tom. ii. p. 607.

The discovery of the New World was fortunately reserved for a period when the human race was sufficiently enlightened to form some conception of its importance. Public attention was promptly and eagerly directed to this momentous event, so that few facts worthy of note, during the whole progress of discovery from its earliest epoch, have escaped contemporary record. Many of these notices have, indeed, perished through neglect, in the various repositories in which they were scattered. The researches of Navarrete have rescued many, and will, it is to be hoped, many more from their progress to oblivion. The two first volumes of his compilation, containing the journals and letters of Columbus, the correspondence of the sovereigns with him, and a vast quantity of public and private documents, form, as I have elsewhere remarked, the most authentic basis for a history of that great man. Next to these in importance is the History of the Admiral by his son Ferdinand, whose own experience and opportunities, combined with uncommon literary attainments, eminently qualified him for recording his father's extraordinary life. It must be allowed he has done this with a candour and good faith seldom warped by any overweening, though natural, partiality for his subject. His work met with a whimsical fate. The original was early lost, but happily not before it had been translated into the Italian, from which a Spanish version was afterwards made ; and from this latter, thus reproduced in the same tongue in which it originally appeared, are derived the various translations of it into the other languages of Europe. The Spanish version, which is incorporated into Barcia's collection, is executed in a slovenly manner, and is replete with chronological inaccuracies ; a circumstance not very wonderful, considering the curious transmigration it has undergone.

Another contemporary authority of great value is Peter Martyr, who took so deep an interest in the nautical enterprise of his day, as to make it the subject of a separate work, independent of the abundant notices scattered through his correspondence. His history, "De Rebus Oceanicis et Novo Orbe," has all the value which extensive learning, a reflecting, philosophical mind, and intimate familiarity with the principal actors in the scenes he describes, can give it. Indeed, that no source of information might be wanting to him, the sovereigns authorized him to be present at the council of the Indies whenever any communication was made to that body respecting the progress of discovery. The principal defects of his work arise from the precipitate manner in which the greater part of it was put together, and the consequently imperfect and occasionally contradictory statements which appear in it. But the honest intentions and liberal spirit of the author are so apparent, as to disarm criticism in respect to comparatively venial errors.

But the writer who has furnished the greatest supply of materials for the modern historian is Antonio de Herrera. He did not flourish, indeed, until near a century after the discovery of America ; but the post which he occupied of historiographer of the Indies gave him free access to the most authentic and reserved sources of information. He has availed himself of these with great freedom ; transferring whole chapters from the unpublished narratives of his predecessors, especially of the good Bishop Las Casas, whose great work, Cronica de las Indias Occidentales, contained too much that was offensive to national feeling to be allowed the honours of the press. The apostle of the Indians, however, lives in the pages of Herrera, who, while he has omitted the tumid and overheated declamation of the original, is allowed by the Castilian critics to have redeemed whatever is of most value, and exhibited it in a dress far superior to that of his predecessor. It must not be omitted, however, that he is also accused of occasional inadvertence in stating as fact what Las Casas only adduced as tradition or conjecture. His Historia General de las Indias Occidentales, bringing down the narrative to 1554, was published in four volumes, Madrid, 1601. Herrera left several other histories of the different states of Europe, and closed his learned labours in 1625, at the age of sixty.

No Spanish historian has since arisen to contest the palm with Herrera on his own ground, until, at the close of the last century, Don Juan Bautista Muñoz was commissioned by the government to prepare a history of the New World. The talents and liberal acquisitions of this scholar, the free admission opened to him in every place of public and private deposit, and the immense mass of materials collected by his indefatigable researches, authorized the most favourable auguries of his success. These were justified by the character of the first volume, which brought the narrative of early discovery to the period of Bobadilla's mission, written in a perspicuous and agreeable style, with such a discriminating selection of incident and skilful arrangement as convey the most distinct impression to the mind of the reader. Unfortunately, the untimely death of the author crushed his labours in the bud. Their fruits were not wholly lost, however. Señor Navarrete availing himself of them, in connexion with those derived from his own extensive investigations, is pursuing in part the plan of Muñoz, by the publication of original documents; and Mr. Irving has completed this design in regard to the early history of Spanish discovery, by the use which he has made of these materials in constructing out of them the noblest monument to the memory of Columbus.

CHAPTER X.

ITALIAN WARS.—PARTITION OF NAPLES.—GONSALVO OVERRUNS CALABRIA.

1498 — 1502.

DURING the last four years of our narrative, in which the unsettled state of the kingdom and the progress of foreign discovery appeared to demand the whole attention of the sovereigns, a most important revolution was going forward in the affairs of Italy. The death of Charles VIII. would seem to have dissolved the relations recently arisen between that country and the rest of Europe, and to have restored it to its ancient independence. It might naturally have been expected that France, under her new monarch, who had reached a mature age, rendered still more mature by the lessons he had imbibed in the school of adversity, would feel the folly of reviving ambitious schemes, which had cost so dear and ended so disastrously. Italy, too, it might have been presumed, lacerated and still bleeding at every pore, must have learned the fatal consequence of invoking foreign aid in her domestic quarrels, and of throwing open the gates to a torrent sure to sweep down friend and foe indiscriminately in its progress. But experience, alas! did not bring wisdom, and passion triumphed as usual.

Louis XII. on ascending the throne assumed the titles of Duke of Milan and King of Naples; thus unequivocally announcing his intention of asserting his claims, derived through the Visconti family, to the former, and through the Angevin dynasty, to the latter state. His aspiring temper was stimulated rather than satisfied by the martial renown he had acquired in the Italian wars; and he was urged on by the great body of the French chivalry, who, disgusted with a life of inaction, longed for a field where they might win new laurels, and indulge in the joyous license of military adventure.

Unhappily, the court of France found ready instruments for its purpose in the profligate politicians of Italy. The Roman pontiff, in particular, Alexander VI, whose criminal ambition assumes something respectable by contrast with the low vices in which he was habitually steeped, willingly lent himself to a monarch who could so effectually serve his selfish schemes of building up the fortunes of his family. The ancient republic of Venice, departing from her usual sagacious policy, and yielding to her hatred of Lodovico Sforza, and to the lust of territorial acquisition, consented to unite her arms with those of France against Milan, in consideration of a share (not the lion's share) of the spoils of victory.

Florence and many other inferior powers, whether from fear or weakness, or the shortsighted hope of assistance in their petty international feuds, consented either to throw their weight into the same scale, or to remain neuter.*

Having thus secured himself from molestation in Italy, Louis XII. entered into negotiations with such other European powers as were most likely to interfere with his designs. The Emperor Maximilian, whose relations with Milan would most naturally have demanded his interposition, was deeply entangled in a war with the Swiss. The neutrality of Spain was secured by the treaty of Marcousis, August 5th, 1498, which settled all the existing differences with that country; and a treaty with Savoy in the following year guaranteed a free passage through its mountain passes to the French army into Italy.†

Sept. 1499. Having completed these arrangements, Louis lost no time in mustering his forces, which, descending like a torrent on the fair plains of Lombardy, effected the conquest of the entire duchy in little more than a fortnight; and although the prize was snatched for a moment from his grasp, yet French valour and Swiss perfidy soon restored it. The miserable Sforza, the dupe of arts which he had so long practised, was transported into France, where he lingered out the remainder of his days in doleful captivity. He had first called the barbarians into Italy, and it was a righteous retribution which made him their earliest victim.*

* Guicciardini, Istoria d'Italia, tom. i. lib. iv. p. 214; ed. 1645.—Flassan, Hist. de la Diplomatie Française, tom. i. pp. 275. 277.

† Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iii. pp. 397—400.—Flassan, Diplomatie Française, tom. i. p. 279.

By the conquest of Milan, France now took her place among the Italian powers. A preponderating weight was thus thrown into the scale, which disturbed the ancient political balance, and which, if the projects on Naples should be realized, would wholly annihilate it. These consequences, to which the Italian states seemed strangely insensible, had long been foreseen by the sagacious eye of Ferdinand the Catholic, who watched the movements of his powerful neighbour with the deepest anxiety. He had endeavoured, before the invasion of Milan, to awaken the different governments in Italy to a sense of their danger, and to stir them up to some efficient combination against it.† Both he and the

* Guicciardini, Ist. d' Italia, lib. iv. pp. 250 — 252. — Mémoires de La Tremouille, chap. xix. ap. Coll. des Mém. Françaises, tom. xiv. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, pp. 26 — 29; ed. Firenze, 1568.

† Zurita, Hist. de Hernando, tom. i. lib. iii. c. xxxi.

Martyr, in a letter written soon after Sforza's recovery of his capital, says that the Spanish sovereigns "could not conceal their joy at the event, such was their jealousy of France." (Opus Epistolarum, ep. ccxiii.)

The same sagacious writer, the distance of whose residence from Italy removed him from those political factions and prejudices which clouded the optics of his countrymen, saw with deep regret their coalition with France, the fatal consequences of which he predicted in a letter to a friend in Venice, the former minister at the Spanish court. "The King of France," says he, "after he has dined with the Duke of Milan, will come and sup with you." (Epist. ccvii.) Daru, on the authority of Burchard, re-queen had beheld with disquietude the increasing corruptions of the papal court, and that shameless cupidity and lust of power which made it the convenient tool of the French monarch.

By their orders, Garcilasso de la Vega, the Spanish ambassador, read a letter from his sovereigns in the presence of his holiness, (1498,) commenting on his scandalous immorality, his invasion of ecclesiastical rights appertaining to the Spanish crown, his schemes of selfish aggrandizement, and especially his avowed purpose of transferring his son Cæsar Borgia from a sacred to a secular dignity; a circumstance that must necessarily make him, from the manner in which it was to be conducted, the instrument of Louis XII.*

This unsavoury rebuke, which probably lost nothing of its pungency from the tone in which it was delivered, so incensed the pope that he attempted to seize the paper and tear it in pieces, giving vent at the same time to the most indecent reproaches against the minister and his sovereigns. Garcilasso coolly waited till the storm had subsided, and then fers this remarkable prediction, which time so fully verified, to Sforza, on his quitting his capital. (Histoire de Venise, tom. iii. p. 326; 2nd ed.) Martyr's letter, however, is dated some months previously to that event.

* Louis XII, for the good offices of the pope in the affair of his divorce from the unfortunate

Jeanne of France, promised the uncardinalized Cæsar Borgia the duchy of Valence in Dauphiné, with a rent of 20,000 livres, and a considerable force to support him in his flagitious enterprises against the princes of Romagna. Guicciardini, Istor. d'Italia, tom. i. lib. iv. p. 207. — Sismondi, Hist. des Français, tom. xv. p. 275.

replied undauntedly, "That he had uttered no more than became a loyal subject of Castile; that he should never shrink from declaring freely what his sovereigns commanded, or what he conceived to be for the good of Christendom; and if his holiness were displeased with it, he could dismiss him from his court, where he was convinced, indeed, his residence could be no longer useful."*

Ferdinand had no better fortune at Venice, where his negotiations were conducted by Lorenzo Suarez de la Vega, an adroit diplomatist, brother of Garcilasso.† These negotiations were resumed after the occupation of Milan by the French, when the minister availed himself of the jealousy occasioned by that event to excite a determined resistance to the proposed aggression on Naples. But the republic was too sorely pressed by the Turkish war, which Sforza, in the hope of creating a diversion in his own favour, had brought on his country, to allow leisure for other operations: nor did the Spanish court

* Zurita, Hist. de Hernando el Catolico, tom. i. lib. iii. cap. xxxiii.

Garcilasso de la Vega seems to have possessed little of the courtly and politic address of a diplomatist. In a subsequent audience which the pope gave him, together with a special embassy from Castile, his blunt expostulation so much exasperated his holiness, that the latter hinted it would not cost him much to have him thrown into the Tiber. The bold bearing of the Castilian, however, appears to have had its effect, since we find the pope soon after revoking an offensive ecclesiastical provision he had made in Spain, taking occasion at the same time to eulogize the character of the Catholic sovereigns in full consistory. Ibid. lib. iii. cap. xxxiii. xxxv.

† Oviedo has made this cavalier the subject of one of his dialogues. Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 44.

succeed any better at this crisis with the Emperor Maximilian, whose magnificent pretensions were ridiculously contrasted with his limited authority and still more limited revenues, so scanty, indeed, as to give him the contemptuous epithet among the Italians of pochi denari, or the Moneyless. He had conceived himself, indeed, greatly injured, both on the score of his imperial rights and his connexion with Sforza, by the conquest of Milan ; but, with the levity and cupidity essential to his character, he suffered himself, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Spanish court, to be bribed into a truce with King Louis, which gave the latter full scope for his meditated enterprise on Naples.*

Thus disembarrassed of the most formidable means of annoyance, the French monarch went briskly forward with his preparations, the object of which he did not affect to conceal. Frederic, the unfortunate King of Naples, saw himself with dismay now menaced with the loss of empire, ere he had had time to taste the sweets of it. He knew not where to turn for refuge, in his desolate condition, from the impending storm. His treasury was drained, and his kingdom wasted, by the late war. His subjects, although attached to his person, were too familiar with revolutions to stake their lives or fortunes on the cast. His countrymen, the Italians, were in the interests of his enemy ; and his nearest neighbour, the pope, had drawn from personal pique motives for the most deadly hostility.* He had as little reliance on the King of Spain, his natural ally and kinsman, who, he well knew, had always regarded the crown of Naples as his own rightful inheritance. He resolved, therefore, to apply at once to the French monarch ; and he endeavoured to propitiate him by the most humiliating concessions,—the offer of an annual tribute, and the surrender into his hands of some of the principal fortresses in the kingdom. Finding these advances coldly received, he invoked, in the extremity of his distress, the aid of the Turkish Sultan Bajazet, the terror of Christendom, requesting such supplies of troops as should enable him to make head against their common foe. This desperate step produced no other result than that of furnishing the enemies of the unhappy prince with a plausible ground of accusation against him, of which they did not fail to make good use.†

* Zurita, Hist. de Hernando, tom. i. lib. iii. cap. xxxviii. xxxix.—Daru, Hist. de Venise, tom. iii. pp. 336. 339. 347.—

Muratori, Annali d' Italia, tom. xiv. pp. 9, 10 ; ed. Milan, 1820.—Guicciardini, Istori. d' Italia, tom. i. lib. v. p. 260.

The Spanish government, in the mean time, made the most vivid remonstrances through its resident

* Alexander VI. had requested the hand of Charlotta, daughter of King Frederic for his son Cæsar Borgia ; but this was a sacrifice at which pride and parental affection alike revolted. The slight was not to be forgiven by the implacable Borgias. Cf. Giannone, Istoria di Napoli, lib. xxix. cap. iii.—Guicciardini, Istoria d'Italia, tom. i. lib. iv.

p. 223. — Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iii. c. xxii.

† Guicciardini, Istor. d'Ital. tom. i. lib. v. pp. 265, 266. — Giannone, Istoria del Regno di Napoli, lib. xxix. cap. iii.—Zurita, Hist. de Hernando, tom. i. lib. iii. cap. xl. — P. Jovii Hist. Magni Gonsalvi, lib. i. p. 229. — Daru, Histoire de Venise, tom. iii. p. 338.

minister, or agents expressly accredited for the purpose, against the proposed expedition of Louis XII. It even went so far as to guarantee the faithful discharge of the tribute proffered by the King of Naples.* But the reckless ambition of the French monarch, overleaping the barriers of prudence, and indeed of common sense, disdained the fruits of conquest without the name.

Ferdinand now found himself apparently reduced to the alternative of abandoning the prize at once to the French king, or of making battle with him in defence of his royal kinsman. The first of these measures, which would bring a restless and powerful rival on the borders of his Sicilian dominions, was not to be thought of for a moment: the latter, which pledged him a second time to the support of pretensions hostile to his own, was scarcely more palatable. A third expedient suggested itself; the partition of the kingdom, as hinted in the negotiations with Charles VIII.† by which means the Spanish government, if it could not rescue the whole prize from the grasp of Louis, would at least divide it with him.

Instructions were accordingly given to Gralla, the minister at the court of Paris, to sound the government on this head, bringing it forward as his own private suggestion. Care was taken at the same time to secure a party in the French councils to the interests of Ferdinand.* The suggestions of the Spanish envoy received additional weight from the report of a considerable armament then equipping in the port of Malaga. Its ostensible purpose was to coöperate with the Venetians in the defence of their possessions in the Levant. Its main object, however, was to cover the coasts of Sicily in any event from the French, and to afford the means for prompt action on any point where circumstances might require it. The fleet consisted of about sixty sail, large and small, and carried forces amounting to 600 horse and 4000 foot, picked men, many of them drawn from the hardy regions of the North, which had been taxed least severely in the Moorish wars.†

* Pet. Martyr, Opus Epistolarum, lib. xiv. ep. ccxviii.

† See Part ii. chap. iii. of this History.

The command of the whole was entrusted to the Great Captain, Gonsalvo of Cordova, who, since his return home, had fully sustained the high reputation which his brilliant military talents had acquired for him abroad. Numerous volunteers, comprehending the noblest of the young chivalry of Spain, pressed forward to serve under the banner of this accom-

* According to Zurita, Ferdinand secured the services of Guillaume de Poitiers, lord of Clerieux and governor of Paris, by the promise of the city of Cotron, mortgaged to him in Italy. (Hist. de Hernando, lib. iii. c. xl.) Comines calls the same nobleman "a good sort of a man, qui aisément croit, et pour especial tels personnages," meaning King Ferdinand. Mé-moires de Comines, liv. viii. ch. xxiii.

† Bembo, Storia Viniziana, tom. iii. lib. v. p. 324.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 2; ed. Venetia, 1606.—Mariana, Hist. tom. ii. lib. xxvii. cap. vii.—P. Jovii Vitæ Illust. Virorum, tom. i. p. 226.—Zurita, Hist. de Hern. tom. i. lib. iv. cap. 11.—Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. x. sec. xiii.

plished and popular chieftain. Among them may be particularly noticed, Diego de Mendoza, son of the Grand Cardinal, Pedro de la Paz,* Gonzalo Pizarro, father of the celebrated adventurer of Peru, and Diego de Paredes, whose personal prowess and feats of extravagant daring furnished many an incredible legend for chronicle and romance. With this gallant armament the Great Captain weighed anchor in the port of Malaga, May 1500, designing to touch at Sicily before proceeding against the Turks.†

In the mean while, the negotiations between France and Spain respecting Naples were brought to a close by a treaty for the equal partition of the kingdom between the two powers, ratified at Granada, November 11th, 1500. This extraordinary document, after enlarging on the unmixed evils flowing from war, and the obligation on all Christians to preserve inviolate the blessed peace bequeathed them by the Saviour, proceeds to state that no other prince, save the kings of France and Aragon, can pretend to a title to the throne of Naples; and as King Frederic, its present occupant, has seen fit to endanger the safety of all Christendom by bringing on it its bitterest enemy the Turks, the contracting parties, in order to rescue it

* This cavalier, one of the most valiant captains in the army, was so diminutive in size, that, when mounted, he seemed almost lost in the high demipeak war-saddle then in vogue; which led a wag, according to Brantôme, when asked if he had seen from this imminent peril, and preserve inviolate the bond of peace, agree to take possession of his kingdom and divide it between them. It is then provided that the northern portion, comprehending the Terra de Lavoro and Abruzzo, be assigned to France, with the titles of King of Naples and Jerusalem, and the southern, consisting of Apulia and Calabria, with the title of Duke of those provinces, to Spain. The douana, an important duty levied on the flocks of the Capitanate, was to be collected by the officers of the Spanish government, and divided equally with France. Lastly, any inequality between the respective territories was to be so adjusted, that the revenues accruing to each of the parties should be precisely equal. The treaty was to be kept profoundly secret, until preparations were completed for the simultaneous occupation of the devoted territory by the combined powers.*

Don Pedro de Paz pass that way, to answer that "he had seen his horse and saddle, but no rider." Œuvres, tom. i. Disc. ix.

† Ferreras, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. viii. p. 217.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. clxi.—Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. ix.

Such were the terms of this celebrated compact, by which two European potentates coolly carved out and divided between them the entire dominions of a third, who had given no cause for umbrage, and with whom they were both at that time in perfect peace and amity. Similar instances of political robbery (to call it by the coarse name it merits) have occurred in later times; but never one founded on more flimsy pretexts, or veiled under a more detestable mask of hypocrisy. The principal odium of the transaction has attached to Ferdinand, as the kinsman of the unfortunate King of Naples. His conduct, however, admits of some palliatory considerations, that cannot be claimed for Louis.

* See the original treaty, apud Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iii. pp. 445, 446.

The Aragonese nation always regarded the bequest of Ferdinand's uncle, Alphonso V, in favour of his natural offspring as an unwarrantable and illegal act. The kingdom of Naples had been won by their own good swords, and as such was the rightful inheritance of their own princes. Nothing but the domestic troubles of his dominions had prevented John II. of Aragon, on the decease of his brother, from asserting his claim by arms. His son, Ferdinand the Catholic, had hitherto acquiesced in the usurpation of the bastard branch of his house only from similar causes. On the accession of the present monarch, he had made some demonstrations of vindicating his pretensions to Naples, which, however, the intelligence he received from that kingdom induced him to defer to a more convenient season :* but it was deferring, not relinquishing his purpose. In the mean time, he carefully avoided entering into such engagements as should compel him to a different policy by connecting his own interests with those of Frederic; and with this view, no doubt, rejected the alliance, strongly solicited by the latter, of the Duke of Calabria, heir apparent to the Neapolitan crown, with his third daughter, the Infanta Maria. Indeed, this disposition of Ferdinand, so far from being dissembled, was well understood by the court of Naples, as is acknowledged by its own historians.*

* See Part ii. chap. iii. of this History.

It may be thought that the undisturbed succession of four princes to the throne of Naples, each of whom had received the solemn recognition of the people, might have healed any defects in their original title, however glaring. It may be remarked, however, in extenuation of both the French and Spanish claims, that the principles of monarchical succession were but imperfectly settled in that day ; that oaths of allegiance were tendered too lightly by the Neapolitans to carry the same weight as in other nations ; and that the prescriptive right derived from possession, necessarily indeterminate, was greatly weakened in this case by the comparatively few years, not more than forty, during which the bastard line of Aragon had occupied the throne,—a period much shorter than that, after which the house of York, in England, a few years previous, had successfully contested the validity of the Lancastrian title. It should be added, that Ferdinand's views appear to have perfectly corresponded with those of the Spanish nation at large ; not one writer of the time, whom I have met with, intimating the slightest doubt of his title to Naples, while not a few insist on it with unnecessary emphasis.† It is

* Giannone, lib. xxix. cap. iii.—Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iii. cap. xxxii.

† See, in particular, the Doctor Salazar de Mendoza, who exhausts the subject,—and the reader's patience,—in discussing the multifarious grounds of the incontrovertible title of the house of Aragon to Naples. Monarquia de Esp. tom. i. lib. iii. cap. xii—xv.

but fair to state, however, that foreigners, who contemplated the transaction with a more impartial eye, condemned it as inflicting a deep stain on the characters of both potentates. Indeed, something like an apprehension of this, in the parties themselves, may be inferred from their solicitude to deprecate public censure, by masking their designs under a pretended zeal for religion.

Before the conferences respecting the treaty were brought to a close, the Spanish armada under Gonsalvo, after a brief detention at Sicily, July 15th, 1500, where it was reinforced by 2000 additional recruits, who had been serving as mercenaries in Italy, held its course for the Morea. The Turkish squadron, lying before Napoli di Romania, without waiting Gonsalvo's approach, raised the siege and retreated precipitately to Constantinople. The Spanish general then, uniting his forces with the Venetians stationed at Corfu, proceeded at once against the fortified place of St. George in Cephalonia, which the Turks had lately wrested from the republic.*

The town stood high on a rock in an impregnable position, and was garrisoned by four hundred Turks, all veteran soldiers, prepared to die in its defence. We have not room for the details of this siege, in which both parties displayed unbounded courage and resources, and which was protracted nearly two months under all the privations of famine, and the inclemencies of a cold and stormy winter.*

* P. Jovii Vitæ, tom. i. p. 226.—Chronica del Gran Capitán, cap. ix.; ed. Alcala, 1584.—

Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iv. cap. xix.

At length, weary with this fatal procrastination, Gonsalvo and the Venetian Admiral Pesaro resolved on a simultaneous attack on separate quarters of the town. The ramparts had been already shaken by the mining operations of Pedro Navarro, who, in the Italian wars, acquired such terrible celebrity in this department, till then little understood. The Venetian cannon, larger and better served than that of the Spaniards, had opened a practicable breach in the works, which the besieged repaired with such temporary defences as they could. The signal being given at the appointed hour, the two armies made a desperate assault on different quarters of the town, under cover of a murderous fire of artillery. The Turks supported the attack with dauntless resolution, stopping up the breach with the bodies of their dead and dying comrades, and pouring down volleys of shot, arrows, burning oil and sulphur, and missiles of every kind on the heads of the assailants. But the desperate energy, as well as numbers of the latter, proved too strong for them. Some forced the breach, others scaled the ramparts, and, after a short and deadly struggle within the walls, the brave garrison, four-fifths of whom with their commander had fallen, were overpowered, and the victorious banners of St. Jago and St. Mark were planted side by side triumphantly on the towers, Jan. 1501.*

* P. Jovii Vitæ, ubi supra.—Chron. del Gran Cap. c. xiv.

The capture of this place, although accomplished at considerable loss, and after a most gallant resistance by a mere handful of men, was of great service to the Venetian cause ; since it was the first check given to the arms of Bajazet, who had filched one place after another from the republic, menacing its whole colonial territory in the Levant. The promptness and efficiency of King Ferdinand's succour to the Venetians gained him high reputation throughout Europe, and precisely of the kind which he most coveted, that of being the zealous defender of the faith ; while it formed a favourable contrast to the cold supineness of the other powers of Christendom.

The capture of St. George restored to Venice the possession of Cephalaria ; and the Great Captain, having accomplished this important object, returned in the beginning of the following year, 1501, to Sicily. Soon after his arrival there, an embassy waited on him from the Venetian senate, to acknowledge their grateful sense of his services, which they testified by enrolling his name on the golden book as a nobleman of Venice, and by a magnificent present of plate, curious silks and velvets, and a stud of beautiful Turkish horses. Gonsalvo courteously accepted the proffered honours, but distributed the whole of the costly largess, with the exception of a few pieces of plate, among his friends and soldiers.*

* P. Jovius, ubi sup.—Chron. del Gr. Capitan, cap. x.—Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iv. cap.

xxv. — Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. clxvii.

In the mean while, Louis XII. having completed his preparations for the invasion of Naples, an army, consisting of 1000 lances and 10,000 Swiss and Gascon foot, crossed the Alps, and directed its march towards the South, June 1, 1501. At the same time, a powerful armament, under Philip de Ravenstein, with 6500 additional troops on board, quitted Genoa for the Neapolitan capital. The command of the land forces was given to the Sire d'Aubigny, the same brave and experienced officer who had formerly coped with Gonsalvo in the campaigns of Calabria.†

No sooner had d'Aubigny crossed the papal borders, than the French and Spanish ambassadors announced to Alexander VI. and the College of Cardinals the existence of the treaty for the partition of the kingdom between the sovereigns their masters, requesting his holiness to confirm it, and grant them the investiture of their respective shares. In this very reasonable petition his holiness, well drilled in the part he was to play, acquiesced without difficulty ; declaring himself moved thereto solely by his consideration of the pious intentions of the parties, and the unworthiness of King Frederic, whose treachery to the Christian commonwealth had forfeited all right (if he ever possessed any) to the crown of Naples.*

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. clxvii. Quintana, Españ. Celebres, tom. i. p. 246. — P. Jovii Vitæ, p. 228. — Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 4.

† J. d'Auton, Hist. de Louis

XII. Part i. chap. xlv. xlv. xlviii. — Guicciardini, Istoria, tom. i. p. 265. — St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. p. 163 ; ed. 1522. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 46.

From the moment that the French forces had descended into Lombardy, the eyes of all Italy were turned with breathless expectation on Gonsalvo, and his army in Sicily. The bustling preparations of the French monarch had diffused the knowledge of his designs throughout Europe. Those of the King of Spain, on the contrary, remained enveloped in profound secrecy. Few doubted that Ferdinand would step forward to shield his kinsman from the invasion which menaced him, and, it might be, his own dominions in Sicily; and they looked to the immediate junction of Gonsalvo with King Frederic, in order that their combined strength might overpower the enemy before he had gained a footing in the kingdom. Great was their astonishment, then, when the scales dropped from their eyes, and they beheld the movements of Spain in perfect accordance with those of France, and directed to crush their common victim between them. They could scarcely credit, says Guicciardini, that Louis XII. could be so blind as to reject the proffered vassalage and substantial sovereignty of Naples, in order to share it with so artful and dangerous a rival as Ferdinand.†

The unfortunate Frederic, who had been advised for some time past of the unfriendly dispositions of the Spanish government, saw no refuge from the dark tempest mustering against him on the opposite quarters of his kingdom.* He collected such troops as he could, however, in order to make battle with the nearest enemy, before he should cross the threshold. On the 28th of June, the French army resumed its march. Before quitting Rome, a brawl arose between some French soldiers and Spaniards resident in the capital; each party asserting the paramount right of its own sovereign to the crown of Naples. From words they soon came to blows, and many lives were lost before the fray could be quelled; a melancholy augury for the permanence of the concord so unrighteously established between the two governments.†

* Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iv. cap. xliii. — Lanuza, Hist. de Aragon, tom. i. lib. i. cap. xiv.

† Guicciardini, tom. i. lib. v. p. 266. — Alf. de Ulloa, fol. 8.

On the 8th of July, the French crossed the Neapolitan frontier. Frederic, who had taken post at St. Germano, found himself so weak, that he was compelled to give way on its approach, and retreat on his capital. The invaders went forward, occupying one place after another with little resistance till they came before Capua, where they received a temporary check. During a parley for the surrender of that place, they burst into the town, and,

* In the month of April the King of Naples received letters from his envoys in Spain, written by command of King Ferdinand, informing him that he had nothing to expect from that monarch in case of an invasion of his territories by France. Frederic bitterly complained of the late hour at which this intelligence was given, which effectually prevented an accommodation he might otherwise have made with King Louis. Lanuza, Hist. de Arag. lib. i. cap. xiv.—Zurita, tom. i. lib. iv. cap. xxxvii.

† J. d'Auton, Part i. chap. xlviii.

giving free scope to their fiendish passions, butchered 7000 citizens in the streets, and perpetrated outrages worse than death on their defenceless wives and daughters. It was on this occasion that Alexander VI.'s son, the infamous Cæsar Borgia, selected forty of the most beautiful from the principal ladies of the place, and sent them back to Rome to swell the complement of his seraglio. The dreadful doom of Capua deterred further resistance, but inspired such detestation of the French throughout the country, as proved of infinite prejudice to their cause in their subsequent struggle with the Spaniards.*

King Frederic, shocked at bringing such calamities on his subjects, resigned his capital without a blow in its defence, and retreating to the isle of Ischia, Oct. 1501, soon after embraced the counsel of the French Admiral Ravenstein, to accept a safe-conduct into France, and throw himself on the generosity of Louis XII. The latter received him courteously, and assigned him the duchy of Anjou with an ample revenue for his maintenance, which, to the credit of the French king, was continued after he had lost all hope of recovering the crown of Naples.† With this show of magnanimity, however, he kept a jealous eye on his royal guest; under pretence of showing him the greatest respect, he placed a guard over his iv. cap. xli.—Giannone, lib. xxix. c. iii.

* Summonte, Historia di Napoli, tom. iii. lib. vi. cap. iv. — Auton, P. i. ch. li—liv.—Ulloa, fol. 8. — Guicciardini, lib. v. pp. 268, 269.—Zurita, tom. i. lib.

† St. Gelais, p. 163. — Auton, P. i. ch. lvi. — Summonte, tom. iii. p. 541.

person, and thus detained him in a sort of honourable captivity to the day of his death, which occurred soon after, in 1504.

Frederic was the last of the illegitimate branch of Aragon, who held the Neapolitan sceptre; a line of princes, who, whatever might be their characters in other respects, accorded that munificent patronage to letters which sheds a ray of glory over the roughest and most turbulent reign. It might have been expected that an amiable and accomplished prince like Frederic would have done still more towards the moral development of his people, by healing up the animosities which had so long festered in their bosoms. His gentle character, however, was ill suited to the evil times on which he had fallen; and it is not improbable that he found greater contentment in the calm and cultivated retirement of his latter years, sweetened by the sympathies of friendship which adversity had proved,* than when placed on the dazzling heights which attract the admiration and envy of mankind.†

* The reader will readily call to mind the Neapolitan poet Sannazaro, whose fidelity to his royal master forms, so beautiful a contrast with the conduct of Pontano, and indeed of too many of his tribe, whose gratitude is of that sort that will only rise above zero in the sunshine of a court. His various poetical effusions afford a noble testimony to the virtues of his unfortunate sovereign, the more unsuspicious as many of them were produced in the days of his adversity.

† “Neque mala, vel bona,” says the philosophic Roman, “quæ vulgus putet: multos, qui conflictari adversis videantur, beatos; ac plerosque, quamquam magnas per opes, miserri- mos; si illi gravem fortunam constanter tolerant, hi prosperâ inconsultè utantur.” Tacitus, Annales, lib. vi. sect. xxii.

Early in March, Gonsalvo of Cordova had received his first official intelligence of the partition treaty, and of his own appointment to the post of lieutenant-general of Calabria and Apulia. He felt natural regret at being called to act against a prince whose character he esteemed, and with whom he had once been placed in the most intimate and friendly relations. In the true spirit of chivalry, he returned Frederic, before taking up arms against him, the duchy of St. Angel and the other large domains with which that monarch had requited his services in the late war, requesting at the same time to be released from his obligations of homage and fealty. The generous monarch readily complied with the latter part of his request, but insisted on his retaining the grant, which he declared an inadequate compensation, after all, for the benefits the Great Captain had once rendered him.*

The levies assembled at Messina amounted to 300 heavy armed, 300 light horse, and 3800 infantry, together with a small body of Spanish veterans, which the Castilian ambassador had collected in Italy. The number of the forces was inconsiderable, but they were in excellent condition, well disciplined, and seasoned to all the toils and difficulties of war. On the 5th of July, the Great Captain landed at Tropea, and commenced the conquest of Calabria, ordering the fleet to keep along the coast, in order to furnish

* Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iv. —Chron. del Gr. Cap. c. xxi.—
c. xxxv.—P. Jovii Vitæ, p. 230. Lanuza, tom. i. lib. i. cap. xiv.

whatever supplies he might need. The ground was familiar to him, and his progress was facilitated by the old relations he had formed there, as well as by the important posts which the Spanish government had retained in its hands as an indemnification for the expenses of the late war. Notwithstanding the opposition or coldness of the great Angevin lords, who resided in this quarter, the entire occupation of the two Calabrias, with the exception of Tarento, was effected in less than a month.*

The latter place, remarkable in ancient times for its defence against Hannibal, was of the last importance. King Frederic had sent his eldest son there, the Duke of Calabria, a youth of about fourteen years of age, under the care of Juan de Guevara, Count of Potenza, with a strong body of troops, considering it the place of greatest security in his dominions. Independently of the strength of its works, it was rendered nearly inaccessible by its natural position, having no communication with the main land, except by two bridges at opposite quarters of the town, commanded by strong towers, while its exposure to the sea made it easily accessible to supplies from abroad.

Gonsalvo saw that the only method of reducing the place must be by blockade. Disagreeable as the delay was, he prepared to lay regular siege to it, ordering the fleet to sail round the southern point of

* Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. lib. iv. cap. xliv.—Mariana, tom. cap. xi. sec. viii.—Zurita, tom. i. ii. lib. xxvii. cap. ix.

Calabria, and blockade the port of Tarento, while he threw up works on the land side, which commanded the passes to the town, and cut off its communications with the neighbouring country. The place, however, was well victualled, and the garrison prepared to maintain it to the last.*

Nothing tries more severely the patience and discipline of the soldier than a life of sluggish inaction, unenlivened, as in the present instance, by any of the rencontres, or feats of arms, which keep up military excitement, and gratify the cupidity or ambition of the warrior. The Spanish troops, cooped up within their intrenchments, and disgusted with the languid monotony of their life, cast many a wistful glance to the stirring scenes of war in the centre of Italy, where Cæsar Borgia held out magnificent promises of pay and plunder to all who embarked in his adventurous enterprises. He courted the aid, in particular, of the Spanish veterans, whose worth he well understood; for they had often served under his banner, in his feuds with the Italian princes. In consequence of these inducements, some of Gonsalvo's men were found to desert every day; while those who remained were becoming hourly more discontented, from the large arrears due from the government; for Ferdinand, as already remarked, conducted his operations with a stinted economy, very different from the prompt and liberal expenditure of the queen, always competent to its object.*

* P. Jovii Vitæ, p. 231. — xxix. cap. iii.—Chronica del Gr. Ulloa, fol. 9. — Giannone, lib. Capitan, cap. xxxi.

A trivial incident, at this time, swelled the popular discontent into mutiny. The French fleet, after the capture of Naples, was ordered to the Levant to assist the Venetians against the Turks. Ravenstein, ambitious of eclipsing the exploits of the Great Captain, turned his arms against Mitylene, with the design of recovering it for the republic. He totally failed in the attack, and his fleet was soon after scattered by a tempest, and his own ship wrecked on the isle of Cerigo. He subsequently found his way, with several of his principal officers, to the shores of Calabria, where he landed in the most forlorn and desperate plight. Gonsalvo, touched with his misfortunes, no sooner learned his necessities than he sent him abundant supplies of provisions, adding a service of plate, and a variety of elegant apparel for himself and followers; consulting his own munificent spirit in this, much more than the limited state of his finances.†

This excessive liberality was very inopportune. The soldiers loudly complained that their general

* Don Juan Manuel, the Spanish minister at Vienna, seems to have been fully sensible of this trait of his master. He told the Emperor Maximilian, who had requested the loan of 300,000 ducats from Spain, that it was as much money as would suffice

King Ferdinand for the conquest, not merely of Italy, but Africa into the bargain. Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iii. cap. xlii.

† Bembo, Ist. Viniz. tom. iii. lib. vi. p. 368.—P. Jovii Vitæ, p. 232.—Auton, P. i. ch. 71, 72.

found treasures to squander on foreigners, while his own troops were defrauded of their pay. The Biscayans, a people of whom Gonsalvo used to say, "he had rather be a lion-keeper than undertake to govern them," took the lead in the tumult. It soon swelled into open insurrection; and the men, forming themselves into regular companies, marched to the general's quarters, and demanded payment of their arrears. One fellow, more insolent than the rest, levelled a pike at his breast with the most angry and menacing looks. Gonsalvo, however, retaining his self-possession, gently put it aside, saying with a good-natured smile, "Higher, you careless knave! lift your lance higher, or you will run me through in your jesting." As he was reiterating his assurances of the want of funds, and his confident expectation of speedily obtaining them, a Biscayan captain called out, "Send your daughter to the brothel, and that will soon put you in funds!" This was a favourite daughter named Elvira, whom Gonsalvo loved so tenderly, that he would not part with her even on his campaigns. Although stung to the heart by this audacious taunt, he made no reply, but, without changing a muscle of his countenance, continued, in the same tone as before, to expostulate with the insurgents, who at length were prevailed on to draw off, and disperse to their quarters. The next morning, the appalling spectacle of the lifeless body of the Biscayan, suspended by the neck from a window of the house in which he had been quartered, admonished the army that there were limits to the general's forbearance it was not prudent to overstep.*

An unexpected event, which took place at this juncture, contributed even more than this monitory lesson to restore subordination to the army. This was the capture of a Genoese galleon with a valuable freight, chiefly iron, bound to some Turkish port, as it was said, in the Levant, which Gonsalvo, moved no doubt by his zeal for the Christian cause, ordered to be seized by the Spanish cruisers; and the cargo to be disposed of for the satisfaction of his troops. Giovio charitably excuses this act of hostility against a friendly power with the remark, that "when the Great Captain did any thing contrary to law, he was wont to say, 'A general must secure the victory at all hazards, right or wrong; and, when he has done this, he can compensate those whom he has injured with tenfold benefits.'"[†]

The unexpected length of the siege of Tarento determined Gonsalvo at length to adopt bolder measures for quickening its termination. The city, whose insulated position has been noticed, was bounded on the north by a lake, or rather arm of the sea, forming an excellent interior harbour, about eighteen miles in circumference. The inhabitants, trusting to the natural defences of this quarter, had omitted to protect it by fortifications, and the houses rose ab-

* Chr. del Gr. Cap. cap. xxxiv.
—Quintana, Vidas, tom. i. pp.
252, 253.—Jovii Vitæ, p. 232.

† P. Jovii Vita Gonsalvi,
lib. i. p. 233.

ruptly from the margin of the basin. Into this reservoir the Spanish commander resolved to transport such of his vessels, then riding in the outer bay, as, from their size, could be conveyed across the narrow isthmus which divided it from the inner.

After incredible toil, twenty of the smallest craft were moved on huge cars and rollers across the intervening land, and safely launched on the bosom of the lake. The whole operation was performed amid the exciting accompaniments of discharges of ordnance, strains of martial music, and loud acclamations of the soldiery. The inhabitants of Tarento saw with consternation the fleet so lately floating in the open ocean under their impregnable walls, now quitting its native element, and moving, as it were by magic, across the land, to assault them on the quarter where they were least defended.*

The Neapolitan commander saw it would be impossible to hold out longer, without compromising the personal safety of the young prince under his care. He accordingly entered into negotiations for a truce with the Great Captain, during which articles of capitulation were arranged, guaranteeing to the Duke of Calabria and his followers the right of evacuating the place and going wherever they listed. The Spanish general, in order to give greater sacredness to these engagements, bound himself to observe them by an oath on the sacrament.†

* P. Jov. ubi supra.—Chronica del Gran. Capitan, cap. xxxiii.

† Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. iv. cap. lii. liii.—Guicciardini, tom. i.

On the 1st of March 1502, the Spanish army took possession, according to agreement, of the city of Tarento ; and the Duke of Calabria with his suite was permitted to leave it, in order to rejoin his father in France. Meantime, advices were received from Ferdinand the Catholic, instructing Gonsalvo on no account to suffer the young prince to escape from his hands, as he was a pledge of too great importance for the Spanish government to relinquish. The general, in obedience to these orders, sent after the duke, who had proceeded in company with the Count of Potenza as far as Bitonto, on his way to the North, and commanded him to be arrested and brought back to Tarento. Not long after, he caused him to be conveyed on board one of the men-of-war in the harbour, and, in contempt of his solemn engagements, sent a prisoner to Spain.*

lib. v. p. 270. — Giannone, lib. xxix. cap. iii. — Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. xiv. p. 14.

The various authorities differ more irreconcilably than usual in the details of this siege. I have followed Paolo Giovio, a contemporary, and personally acquainted with the principal actors. All agree in the only fact in which one would willingly see some discrepancy, Gonsalvo's breach of faith to the young Duke of Calabria.

* Zurita, tom. i. lib. iv. cap. lvi. — Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xi. sec. x — xii. — Ulloa, fol. 9. — Lanuza, lib. i. cap. xiv. Martyr, who was present on the young prince's arrival at court, where he experienced the most honourable reception, speaks of him in the highest terms. "Adolescens namque est et regno et regio sanguine dignus, miræ indolis, formâ egregius." (See Opus Epistolar. ep. cclii.) He survived to the year 1550, but without ever having quitted Spain, contrary to the fond prediction of his friend Sannazaro ;

"Nam mihi, nam tempus veniet, cum reddita sceptra Parthenopes, fractosque tuâ sub cuspidē reges, Iipse canam."

Opera Latina, ecloga 4.

The national writers have made many awkward attempts to varnish over this atrocious act of perfidy in their favourite hero. Zurita vindicates it by a letter from the Neapolitan prince to Gonsalvo, requesting the latter to take this step, since he preferred a residence in Spain to one in France, but could not with decency appear to act in opposition to his father's wishes on the subject. If such a letter, however, were really obtained from the prince, his tender years would entitle it to little weight, and of course it would afford no substantial ground for justification. Another explanation is offered by Paolo Giovio, who states that the Great Captain, undetermined what course to adopt, took the opinion of certain learned jurists. This sage body decided that Gonsalvo was not bound by his oath, since it was repugnant to his paramount obligations to his master; and that the latter was not bound by it, since it was made without his privity! * — The man who trusts his honour to the tampering of casuists, has parted with it already.

The only palliation of the act must be sought in the prevalent laxity and corruption of the period, which is rife with examples of the most flagrant violation of both public and private faith. Had this

* Zurita, Hist. lib. iv. cap. lviii. — P. Jovii Vitæ, lib. i. p. 234.

Mariana coolly disposes of Gonsalvo's treachery with the remark, "No parece se le guardo lo que tenían asentado. En la guerra quien hay que de todo punto lo guarde?" (Hist. de España, tom. ii. p. 675.)

———"Dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirat?"

been the act of a Sforza, indeed, or a Borgia, it could not reasonably have excited surprise ; but coming from one of a noble, magnanimous nature, like Gonsalvo, exemplary in his private life, and unstained with any of the grosser vices of the age, it excited general astonishment and reprobation even among his contemporaries. It has left a reproach on his name, which the historian may regret, but cannot wipe away.

CHAPTER XI.

ITALIAN WARS.—RUPTURE WITH FRANCE.—GONSALVO
BESIEGED IN BARLETA.

1502, 1503.

It was hardly to be expected that the partition treaty between France and Spain, made so manifestly in contempt of all good faith, would be maintained any longer than suited the convenience of the respective parties. The French monarch, indeed, seems to have prepared, from the first, to dispense with it so soon as he had secured his own moiety of the kingdom; * and sagacious men at the Spanish court inferred that King Ferdinand would do as

* Peter Martyr, in a letter written from Venice, while detained there on his way to Alexandria, speaks of the efforts made by the French emissaries to induce the republic to break with Spain, and support their master in his designs on Naples. “Adsunt namque à Ludovico rege Gallorum oratores, qui omni nixu conantur à vobis Vene-

torum animos avertere. Fre-mere dentibus aiunt oratorem primarium Gallum, quia ne-queat per Venetorum suffragia consequi, ut apertè vobis hostilitatem edicant; utque velint Gallis regno Parthenopeo contra vestra præsidia ferre suppetias.”
The letter is dated October 1st, 1501. *Opus Epistolarum, ep.
ccxxxi.*

much when he should be in a situation to assert his claims with success.*

It was altogether improbable, whatever might be the good faith of the parties, that an arrangement could long subsist, which so rudely rent asunder the members of this ancient monarchy; or that a thousand points of collision should not arise between rival hosts, lying as it were on their arms within bowshot of each other, and in view of the rich spoil which each regarded as its own. Such grounds for rupture did occur, sooner probably than either party had foreseen, and certainly before the King of Aragon was prepared to meet it.

The immediate cause was the extremely loose language of the partition treaty, which assumed such a geographical division of the kingdom into four provinces as did not correspond with any ancient division, and still less with the modern, by which the number was multiplied to twelve.† The central

* Martyr, after noticing the grounds of the partition treaty, comments with his usual shrewdness on the politic views of the Spanish sovereigns. "Faciliùs namque se sperant, eam partem, quam sibi Galli sortiti sunt, habituros aliquando, quàm si universum regnum occuparint." Epist. cccviii.

† The Italian historians, who have investigated the subject with some parade of erudition, treat it so vaguely as to leave it after all nearly as perplexed as they found it. Giovio includes the Capitanate in Apulia, according to the ancient division; Guicciardini according to the modern; and the Spanish historian Mariana, according to both. The latter writer, it may be observed, discusses the matter with equal learning and candour, and more perspicuity than either of the preceding. He admits reasonable grounds for doubt to which moiety of the kingdom the Basilicate and Principalities should be assigned. Mariana, Hist. de España, tom. ii. p. 670. — Guicciardini, tom. i. lib. v.

portion, comprehending the Capitanate, Basilicate, and the Principality, became debatable ground between the parties, each of whom insisted on these as forming an integral part of its own moiety. The French had no ground whatever for contesting the possession of the Capitanate, the first of these provinces, and by far the most important, on account of the tolls paid by the numerous flocks which descended every winter into its sheltered valleys from the snow-covered mountains of Abruzzo.* There was more uncertainty to which of the parties the two other provinces were meant to be assigned. It is scarcely possible that language so loose, in a matter requiring mathematical precision, should have been unintentional.

Before Gonsalvo de Cordova had completed the conquest of the southern moiety of the kingdom, and while lying before Tarento, he received intelligence of the occupation of several places, both in the Capitanate and Basilicate, by the French. He detached a body of troops for the protection of these countries, and after the surrender of Tarento marched towards the North to cover them with his whole army. As he was not in condition for immediate hostilities, however, he entered into negotiations pp. 274, 275.—Jovii Vita Gonsalvi, lib. i. pp. 234, 235.

* The provision of the partition treaty that the Spaniards should collect the tolls paid by the flocks on their descent from the French district of Abruzzo into the Capitanate, is conclusive evidence of the intention of the contracting parties to assign the latter to Spain. See the treaty, ap. Dumont, Corps Diplom. tom. iii. pp. 445, 446.

which, if attended with no other advantage, would at least gain him time.*

April 1st, 1502. The pretensions of the two parties, as might have been expected, were too irreconcilable to admit of compromise; and a personal conference between the respective commanders in chief led to no better arrangement than that each should retain his present acquisitions, till explicit instructions could be received from their respective courts.

But neither of the two monarchs had further instructions to give; and the Catholic king contented himself with admonishing his general to postpone an open rupture as long as possible, that the government might have time to provide more effectually for his support, and strengthen itself by alliance with other European powers. But, however pacific may have been the disposition of the generals, they had no power to control the passions of their soldiers, who, thus brought into immediate contact, glared on each other with the ferocity of bloodhounds, ready to slip the leash which held them in temporary check. Hostilities soon broke out along the lines of the two armies, the blame of which each nation charged on its opponent. There seems good ground, however, for imputing it to the French, since they were altogether better prepared for war than the Spaniards, and entered into it so heartily as not only to assail places in the debatable ground, but in Apulia, which had been unequivocally assigned to their rivals.*

* Zurita, Hist. de Hern. tom. ii. lib. xxvii. cap. xii. — Ulloa, i. lib. iv. c. lii.—Mariana, tom. Vita di Carlo V. fol. 10.

In the mean while, the Spanish court fruitlessly endeavoured to interest the other powers of Europe in its cause. The Emperor Maximilian, although dissatisfied with the occupation of Milan by the French, appeared wholly engrossed with the frivolous ambition of a Roman coronation. The pontiff and his son Cæsar Borgia were closely bound to King Louis by the assistance which he had rendered them in their marauding enterprises against the neighbouring chiefs of Romagna. The other Italian princes, although deeply incensed and disgusted by this infamous alliance, stood too much in awe of the colossal power which had planted its foot so firmly on their territory, to offer any resistance. Venice alone, surveying from her distant watch-tower, to borrow the words of Peter Martyr, the whole extent of the political horizon, appeared to hesitate. The French ambassadors loudly called on her to fulfil the terms of her late treaty with their master, and support him in his approaching quarrel; but that wily republic saw with distrust the encroaching ambition of her

* J. d'Auton, Part ii. ch. iii. — vii. — Zurita, tom. i. lib. iv. cap. lx. lxii. lxiv. lxv. — P. Jovii Vitæ Ill. Viror. tom. i. p. 236. — Giannone, lib. xxix. cap. iv.

Bernaldez states that the Great Captain, finding his conference with the French general ineffectual, proposed to the latter to decide the quarrel between their respective nations by single combat. (Hist. de los Reyes, MS. cap. clxvii.) We should require some other authority, however, than that of the good curate to vouch for this romantic flight, so entirely out of keeping with the Spanish general's character, in which prudence was probably the most conspicuous attribute.

powerful neighbour, and secretly wished a counterpoise might be found in the success of Aragon. Martyr, who stopped at Venice on his return from Egypt, October 1501, appeared before the senate, and employed all his eloquence in supporting his master's cause in opposition to the French envoys ; but his pressing entreaties to the Spanish sovereigns to send thither some competent person as a resident minister, show his own conviction of the critical position in which their affairs stood.*

The letters of the same intelligent individual, during his journey through the Milanese,† are filled with the most gloomy forebodings of the termination of a contest for which the Spaniards were so indifferently provided ; while the whole north of Italy

* Daru, Hist. de Venise, tom. iii. p. 345.—Bembo, Istoria di Venezia, tom. i. lib. vi. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccxxxviii. ccxl. cclii.

This may appear strange, considering that Lorenzo Suarez de la Vega was there ; a person of whom Gonzalo de Oviedo writes, "Fué gentil caballero, é sabio, é de gran prudencia ; * * * muy entendido é de mucho reposo é honesto é afable é de linda conversacion ;" and again, more explicitly, "Embaxador á Venecia, en el qual oficio sirvió muy bien, é como prudente varon." (Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 44.) Martyr admits his prudence, but objects his ignorance of Latin, a deficiency, however heinous in the worthy tutor's eyes, probably of no rare occurrence among the elder Castilian nobles.

† Martyr's letters were many of them addressed to both Ferdinand and Isabella. The former, however, was ignorant of the Latin language, in which they were written. Martyr playfully alludes to this in one of his epistles, reminding the queen of her promise to interpret them faithfully to her husband. The unconstrained and familiar tone of his correspondence affords a pleasing example of the personal intimacy to which the sovereigns, so contrary to the usual stiffness of Spanish etiquette, admitted men of learning and probity at their court, without distinction of rank. Ep. ccxxx.

was alive to the bustling preparations of the French, who loudly vaunted their intention of driving their enemy not merely out of Naples, but Sicily itself.*

Louis XII. superintended these preparations in person, and, in order to be near the theatre of operations, crossed the Alps, July 1502, and took up his quarters at Asti. At length, all being in readiness, he brought things to immediate issue, by commanding his general to proclaim war at once against the Spaniards, unless they abandoned the Capitanate in four-and-twenty hours.†

The French forces in Naples amounted, according to their own statements, to 1000 men-at-arms, 3500 French and Lombard, and 3000 Swiss infantry, in addition to the Neapolitan levies raised by the Angevin lords throughout the kingdom. The command was intrusted to the Duke of Nemours, a brave and chivalrous young nobleman of the ancient house of Armagnac, whom family connexions, more than talents, had raised to the perilous post of viceroy, over the head of the veteran d'Aubigny. The latter would have thrown up his commission in disgust, but for the

* "Galli," says Martyr, in a letter more remarkable for strength of expression than elegance of Latinity, "furunt, sæviunt, interniciem nostris minantur, putantque id sibi fore facillimum. Regem eorum esse in itinere, inquit, ut ipse, cum duplicato exercitu Alpes trajiciat in Italiam. Vestro nomini insurgunt. Cristas erigunt in vos superbissimè. Provinciam hanc, veluti rem humilem, parvique momenti, se aggressuros præconantur. Nihil esse negotiû eradicare, exterminareque vestra præsidia ex utrâque Siciliâ blacterant. Insolenter nimis exspuendo insultant." Epist. ccxli.

† Auton, P. ii. ch. viii.—Giannone, lib. xxix. cap. iv.—Guicciardini, lib. v. pp. 274, 275.—Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 61.

remonstrances of his sovereign, who prevailed on him to remain where his counsels were more than ever necessary to supply the inexperience of the young commander. The jealousy and wilfulness of the latter, however, defeated these intentions, and the misunderstanding of the chiefs, extending to their followers, led to a fatal want of concert in their movements.

With these officers were united some of the best and bravest of the French chivalry ; among whom may be noticed Jacques de Chabannes, more commonly known as the Sire de la Palice, a favourite of Louis XII, and well entitled to be so by his deserts ; Louis d'Ars ; Ives d'Alegre, brother of the Precy who gained so much renown in the wars of Charles VIII ; and Pierre de Bayard, the knight " sans peur et sans reproche," who was then entering on the honourable career in which he seemed to realize all the imaginary perfections of chivalry.*

Notwithstanding the small amount of the French force, the Great Captain was in no condition to cope with it. He had received no reinforcements from home since he first landed in Calabria. His little corps of veterans was destitute of proper clothing and equipment, and the large arrears due to them made

* Guicciardini, lib. v. p. 265.
—Auton, P. i. ch. lvii.—Gaillard, Rivalité, tom. iv. pp. 221
—223.—St. Gelais, p. 169.

Brantôme has introduced sketches of most of the French captains mentioned in the text into his admirable gallery of national portraits. See Œuvres, tom. ii. & iii. Vies des Hommes Illustres.

the tenure of their obedience extremely precarious.* Since affairs began to assume their present menacing aspect, he had been busily occupied with drawing together the detachments posted in various parts of Calabria, and concentrating them on the town of Atella in the Basilicate, where he had established his own quarters. He had also opened a correspondence with the barons of the Aragonese faction, who were most numerous as well as most powerful in the northern section of the kingdom, which had been assigned to the French. He was particularly fortunate in gaining over the two Colonnas, whose authority, powerful connexions, and large military experience, proved of inestimable value to him.†

With all the resources he could command, however, Gonsalvo found himself, as before noticed, unequal to the contest, though it was impossible to defer it, after the peremptory summons of the French viceroy to surrender the Capitanate. To this he

* Martyr's epistles at this crisis are filled with expostulation, argument, and entreaties to the sovereigns, begging them to rouse from their apathy, and take measures to secure the wavering affections of Venice, as well as to send more effectual aid to their Italian troops. Ferdinand listened to the first of these suggestions; but shewed a strange insensibility to the last.

† Zurita, Hist. lib. iv. cap. lxii. lxv.—P. Jovii Vitæ, p. 230.

Prospero Colonna, in particular, was distinguished not only for his military science, but his fondness for letters and the arts, of which he is commemorated by Tiraboschi as a munificent patron. (Letteratura Ital. tom. viii. p. 77; ed. 1784.) Paolo Giovio has introduced him among the effigies of illustrious men, who, it must be confessed, are more indebted in his work to the hand of the historian than the artist. Elog. Vir. Illust. lib. v.; ed. fol. Basil. 1578.

unhesitatingly answered, that “ the Capitanate belonged of right to his own master, and that with the blessing of God he would make good its defence against the French king, or any other who should invade it.”

Notwithstanding the bold front put on his affairs, however, he did not choose to abide the assault of the French in his present position. July 1502. He instantly drew off with the greater part of his force to Barleta, a fortified seaport on the confines of Apulia, in the Adriatic, the situation of which would enable him either to receive supplies from abroad, or to effect a retreat, if necessary, on board the Spanish fleet, which still kept the coast of Calabria. The remainder of his army he distributed in Bari, Andria, Canosa, and other adjacent towns; where he confidently hoped to maintain himself till the arrival of reinforcements, which he solicited in the most pressing manner from Spain and Sicily, should enable him to take the field on more equal terms against his adversary.*

The French officers, in the mean time, were divided in opinion as to the best mode of conducting the war. Some were for besieging Bari, held by the illustrious and unfortunate Isabella of Aragon;†

* Auton, P. ii. ch. viii. — Ulla, fol. 10. — Chron. del Gr. Capit. cap. xlii. — Summonte, tom. iii. p. 541.

† This beautiful and high-spirited lady, whose fate has led Boccacini, in his whimsical satire of the ‘ Raguagli di Parnasso,’ to call her the most unfortunate female on record, had seen her father Alphonso II, and her husband, Galeazzo Sforza, others, in a more chivalrous spirit, opposed the attack on a place defended by a female, and advised an immediate assault on Barleta itself, whose old and dilapidated works might easily be forced, if it did not at once surrender. The Duke of Nemours, deciding on a middle course, determined to invest the last-mentioned town; and, cutting off all communication with the surrounding country, to reduce it by regular blockade. This plan was unquestionably the least eligible of all, as it would allow time for the enthusiasm of the French, the furia Francese, as it was called in Italy, which carried them victorious over so many obstacles, to evaporate, while it brought into play the stern resolve, the calm, unflinching endurance, which distinguished the Spanish soldier.*

One of the first operations of the French viceroy was the siege of Canosa, July 12, 1502; a strongly fortified place west of Barleta, garrisoned by six hundred picked men under the engineer Pedro Navarro. The defence of the place justified the reputation of this gallant soldier. He beat off two successive assaults of the enemy, led on by Bayard, La Palice, and the flower of their chivalry. He had prepared to sustain a third, resolved to bury himself under the ruins of the town rather than surrender; driven from their thrones by the French, while her son still remained in captivity in their hands. No wonder they revolted from accumulating new woes on her devoted head.

* Jovii Vitæ, tom. i. p. 237. —Guicciardini, lib. v. pp. 282, 283.—Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xiv. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. 249.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. clxviii.

but Gonsalvo, unable to relieve it, commanded him to make the best terms he could, saying, "the place was of far less value than the lives of the brave men who defended it. Navarro found no difficulty in obtaining an honourable capitulation; and the little garrison, dwindled to one-third of its original number, marched out, through the enemy's camp, with colours flying and music playing, as if in derision of the powerful force it had so nobly kept at bay.*

After the capture of Canosa, D'Aubigny, whose misunderstanding with Nemours still continued, was despatched with a small force into the south, to overrun the two Calabrias. The viceroy, in the meanwhile, having fruitlessly attempted the reduction of several strong places held by the Spaniards in the neighbourhood of Barleta, endeavoured to straiten the garrison there by desolating the surrounding country, and sweeping off the flocks and herds which grazed in its fertile pastures. The Spaniards, however, did not remain idle within their defences; but, sallying out in small detachments, occasionally retrieved the spoil from the hands of the enemy, or

* Chronica del Gr. Cap. cap. xlvii.—Zurita, tom. i. lib. iv. cap. lxi.—P. Jovii Vitæ, tom. i. p. 241.—Auton, P. ii. ch. xi.—Pet. Martyr, epist. ccxlvii.

Peter Martyr says, that the Spaniards marched through the enemy's camp, shouting "España, España, Viva España!" (ubi sup.) Their gallantry in the defence of Canosa elicits a hearty eulogium from Jean d'Auton, the loyal historiographer of Louis XII. "Je ne veux donc par ma Chronique mettre les biensfaits des Espagnols en oubly, mais dire que pour vertueuse defence, doibuent avoir louange honorable." Ch. xi.

annoyed him with the desultory attacks, ambuscades, and other irregular movements of guerilla warfare, in which the French were comparatively unpractised.*

The war now began to assume many of the romantic features of that of Granada. The knights on both sides, not content with the usual military rencontres, defied one another to jousts and tourneys, eager to establish their prowess in the noble exercises of chivalry. One of the most remarkable of these meetings took place between eleven Spanish and as many French knights, in consequence of some disparaging remarks of the latter on the cavalry of their enemies, which they affirmed inferior to their own. The Venetians gave the parties a fair field of combat in the neutral territory under their own walls of Trani. A gallant array of well-armed knights of both nations guarded the lists, and maintained the order of the fight. On the appointed day, Sept. 20, 1502, the champions appeared in the field, armed at all points, with horses richly caparisoned, and barded or covered with steel panoply like their masters. The roofs and battlements of Trani were covered with spectators; while the lists were thronged with the French and Spanish chivalry, each staking in some degree the national honour on the issue of the contest. Among the Castilians were Diego de Paredes, and Diego de Vera, while the good knight Bayard was most conspicuous on the other side.

* Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. clxix.—Ulloa, fol. 10.—Chron. del Gr. Cap. cap. lxvi.

As the trumpets sounded the appointed signal, the hostile parties rushed to the encounter. Three Spaniards were borne from their saddles by the rudeness of the shock, and four of their antagonists' horses slain. The fight, which began at ten in the morning, was not to be protracted beyond sunset. Long before that hour, all the French save two, one of them the Chevalier Bayard, had been dismounted; and their horses, at which the Spaniards had aimed more than at the riders, disabled or slain. The Spaniards, seven of whom were still on horseback, pressed hard on their adversaries, leaving little doubt of the fortune of the day. The latter, however, intrenching themselves behind the carcasses of their dead horses, made good their defence against the Spaniards, who in vain tried to spur their terrified steeds over the barrier. In this way the fight was protracted till sunset, and, as both parties continued to keep possession of the field, the palm of victory was adjudged to neither, while both were pronounced to have demeaned themselves like good and valiant knights.*

* Chron. del Gr. Capitan, cap. liii.—Auton, P. ii. ch. xxvi.—Jovii Vitæ, pp. 238, 239.—Mém. de Bayard, ch. xxiii. ap. Coll. des Mém. Fr. tom. xv.—Brantôme, tom. iii. Disc. lxxvii.

This celebrated tourney, its causes, and all the details of the action, are told in as many different ways as there are narrators; and this, notwithstanding it was fought in the presence of a crowd of witnesses, who had nothing to do but look on, and note what passed before their eyes. The only facts in which all agree are, that there was such a tourna-

The tourney being ended, the combatants met in the centre of the lists, and embraced each other in the true companionship of chivalry, "making good cheer together," says an old chronicler, before they separated. The Great Captain was not satisfied with the issue of the fight. "We have, at least," said one of his champions, "disproved the taunt of the Frenchmen, and shown ourselves as good horsemen as they." "I sent you for better," coldly retorted Gonsalvo.*

A more tragic termination befel a combat à l'outrance between the Chevalier Bayard and a Spanish cavalier, named Alonso de Sotomayor, who had accused the former of uncourteous treatment of him while his prisoner. Bayard denied the charge, and defied the Spaniard to prove it in single fight on horse or on foot, as he best liked. Sotomayor, aware of his antagonist's uncommon horsemanship, preferred the latter alternative.

Feb. 2, 1503. At the day and hour appointed, the two knights entered the lists, armed with sword and dagger, and sheathed in complete harness; although, with a degree of temerity unusual in these combats, they wore their visors up. Both combatants knelt down in silent prayer for a few moments, and then, rising and crossing themselves, advanced straight against each other; "the good knight Bayard," ment, and that neither party gained the advantage. So much for history!

* Auton, ubi sup. — Quintana, Vidas, tom. ii. p. 263.

says Brantôme, “ moving as light of step as if he were about to lead some fair lady down the dance.”

The Spaniard was of a large and powerful frame, and endeavoured to crush his enemy by weight of blows, or to close with him and bring him to the ground. The latter, naturally inferior in strength, was rendered still weaker by a fever, from which he had not entirely recovered. He was more light and agile than his adversary, however ; and superior dexterity enabled him not only to parry his enemy's strokes, but to deal him occasionally one of his own, while he sorely distressed him by the rapidity of his movements. At length, as the Spaniard was somewhat thrown off his balance by an ill-directed blow, Bayard struck him so sharply on the gorget, that it gave way, and the sword entered deep into his throat. Furious with the agony of his wound, Sotomayor collected all his strength for a last struggle, and, grasping his antagonist in his arms, they both rolled in the dust together. Before either could extricate himself, the quick-eyed Bayard, who had retained his poniard in his left hand during the whole combat, while the Spaniard's had remained in his belt, drove the steel with such convulsive strength under his enemy's eye, that it pierced quite through to the brain. After the judges had awarded the honours of the day to Bayard, the minstrels as usual began to pour forth triumphant strains in praise of the victor ; but the good knight commanded them to desist, and, having first prostrated himself on his knees in gratitude for his victory, walked slowly out of the lists, expressing a wish that the combat had had a different termination, so that his honour had been saved.*

In these jousts and tourneys, described with sufficient prolixity, but in a truly heart-stirring tone, by the chroniclers of the day, we may discern the last gleams of the light of chivalry which illumined the darkness of the middle ages ; and, although rough in comparison with the pastimes of more polished times, they called forth such displays of magnificence, courtesy and knightly honour, as throw something like the grace of civilization over the ferocious features of the age.

While the Spaniards, cooped up within the old town of Barleta, sought to vary the monotony of their existence by these chivalrous exercises, or an occasional foray into the neighbouring country, they suffered greatly from the want of military stores, food, clothing, and the most common necessaries of life. It seemed as if their master had abandoned them to their fate on this forlorn outpost, without a struggle in their behalf.† How different from the

* Brantôme, Œuvres, tom. vi. Discours sur les Duels. — J. d'Auton, P. ii. ch. xxvii. — Ulloa, fol. 11. — Mém. de Bayard, ch. xxii. ap. Coll. des Mém. Fr. — Jovii Vitæ, p. 240.

† According to Martyr, the besieged had been so severely pressed by famine for some time before this, that Gonsalvo entertained serious thoughts of embarking the whole of his little garrison on board the fleet, and abandoning the place to the enemy. “ Barlettæ inclusos fame pesteque urgeri graviter aiunt. Vicina ipsorum omnia Galli occupant, et nostros quotidie magis ac magis premunt. Ita obsessi undique, de relinquendâ etiam Barlettâ, sæpiùs iniere con-parental care with which Isabella watched over the welfare of her soldiers in the long war of Granada! The queen seems to have taken no part in the management of these wars, which, notwithstanding the number of her own immediate subjects embarked in them, she probably regarded, from the first, as appertaining to Aragon as exclusively as the conquests in the New World did to Castile. Indeed, whatever degree of interest she may have felt in their success, the declining state of her health at this period would have allowed her to take no part in the conduct of them.

Gonsalvo was not wanting to himself in this trying emergency, and his noble spirit seemed to rise as all outward and visible resources failed. He cheered his troops with promises of speedy relief, talking confidently of the supplies of grain he expected from Sicily, and the men and money he was to receive from Spain and Venice. He contrived too, says Giovio, that a report should get abroad, that a ponderous coffer lying in his apartment was filled with gold, which he could draw upon in the last extremity. The old campaigners, indeed, according to the same authority, shook their heads at these and other agreeable fictions of their general, with a very sceptical air. They derived some confirmation, however, from the arrival soon after of a Sicilian bark laden with corn, and another from Venice with various serviceable alium. Ut mari terga dent hos- sæpe cadit in deliberationem."

tibus, ne fame pesteque pereant, Ep. ccxlix.

stores and wearing apparel, which Gonsalvo bought on his own credit and that of his principal officers; and distributed gratuitously among his destitute soldiers.*

At this time he received the unwelcome tidings that a small force which had been sent from Spain to his assistance under Don Manuel de Benavides, and which had effected a junction with one much larger from Sicily under Hugo de Cardona, was surprised by D'Aubigny near Terranova, December 25, 1502, and totally defeated. This disaster was followed by the reduction of all Calabria, which the latter general, at the head of his French and Scottish gendarmerie, rode over from one extremity to the other without opposition.†

The prospect now grew darker and darker around the little garrison of Barleta. The discomfiture of Benavides excluded hopes of relief in that direction: The gradual occupation of most of the strong places in Apulia by the Duke of Nemours cut off all communication with the neighbouring country; and a French fleet now cruising in the Adriatic rendered the arrival of further stores and reinforcements extremely precarious. Gonsalvo, however, maintained the same unruffled cheerfulness as before, and endeavoured to infuse it into the hearts of others. He perfectly understood the character of his countrymen,

* P. Jovii Vitæ, p. 242. —
Zurita, tom. i. lib. v. cap. iv. —
Bernaldez, MS. cap. clxvii. — Guicciardini, p. 283.

† Ibid. lib. v. p. 294. — Auton, P. ii. ch. xxii. — Chronica del Gr. Cap. cap. lxiii.

knew all their resources, and tried to rouse every latent principle of honour, loyalty, pride, and national feeling; and such was the authority which he acquired over their minds, and so deep the affection which he inspired, by the amenity of his manners and the generosity of his disposition, that not a murmur or symptom of insubordination escaped them during the whole of this long and painful siege. But neither the excellence of his troops, nor the resources of his own genius, would have been sufficient to extricate Gonsalvo from the difficulties of his situation, without the most flagrant errors on the part of his opponent. The Spanish general, who understood the character of the French commander perfectly well, lay patiently awaiting his opportunity, like a skilful fencer, ready to make a decisive thrust at the first vulnerable point that should be presented. Such an occasion at length offered itself early in the following year.*

The French, no less weary than their adversaries of their long inaction, sallied out from Canosa, where the viceroy had established his head-quarters, January 1503, and, crossing the Ofanto, marched up directly under the walls of Barleta, with the intention of drawing out the garrison from the "old den," as they called it, and deciding the quarrel in a pitched battle. The Duke of Nemours, accordingly, having taken up his position, sent a trumpet into the place to defy the Great Captain to the encounter ; but the latter returned for answer, that “ he was accustomed to choose his own place and time for fighting, and would thank the French general to wait till his men found time to shoe their horses, and burnish up their arms.” At length, Nemours, after remaining some days, and finding there was no chance of decoying his wily foe from his defences, broke up his camp and retired, satisfied with the empty honours of his gasconade.

* Ulloa, fol. 11. — P. Jovii Vit. tom. i. p. 247. — Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. v. cap. ix.

No sooner had he fairly turned his back, than Gonsalvo, whose soldiers had been checked with difficulty from sallying out on their insolent foe, ordered the whole strength of his cavalry under the command of Diego de Mendoza, flanked by two corps of infantry, to issue forth and pursue the French. Mendoza executed these orders so promptly, that he brought up his horse, which were somewhat in advance of the foot, on the rear-guard of the French, before it had got many miles from Barleta. The latter instantly halted to receive the charge of the Spaniards, and, after a lively skirmish of no great duration, Mendoza retreated, followed by the incautious enemy, who, in consequence of their irregular and straggling march, were detached from the main body of their army. In the mean time, the advancing columns of the Spanish infantry, which had now come up with the retreating horse, unexpectedly closing on the enemy's flanks, threw them into some disorder, which became complete when the flying cavalry of the Spaniards suddenly wheeling round, in the rapid style of the Moorish tactics, charged them boldly in front. All was now confusion. Some made resistance, but most sought only to escape; a few effected it, but the greater part of those who did not fall on the field were carried prisoners to Barleta, where Mendoza found the Great Captain with his whole army drawn up under the walls in order of battle, ready to support him in person, if necessary. The whole affair passed so expeditiously, that the viceroy, who, as has been said, conducted his retreat in a most disorderly manner, and, in fact, had already dispersed several battalions of his infantry to the different towns from which he had drawn them, knew nothing of the rencontre till his men were securely lodged within the walls of Barleta.*

The arrival of a Venetian trader at this time, with a cargo of grain, brought a temporary relief to the pressing necessities of the garrison.† This was fol-

* Jovii Vitæ, pp. 243, 244. —Ulloa, fol. 11, 12. A dispute arose, soon after this affair, between a French officer and some Italian gentlemen at Gonsalvo's table, in consequence of certain injurious reflections made by the former on the bravery of the Italian nation. The quarrel was settled by a combat à l'outrance between thirteen knights on each side, fought under the protection of the Great Captain, who took a lively interest in the success of his allies. It terminated in the discomfiture and capture of all the French. The tourney covers more pages in the Italian historians than the longest battle, and is told with a pride and a swell of exultation which show that this insult of the French cut more deeply than all the injuries inflicted by them. Jovii Vitæ, pp. 244 — 247. —Guicciardini, pp. 296 — 298. —Giannone, lib. xxix. cap. iv. —Summonte, tom. iii. pp. 542 — 552; —et al.

† This supply was owing to the avarice of the French general Alègre, who, having got pos-

lowed by the welcome intelligence of the total discomfiture of the French fleet under Mons. de Prejan by the Spanish admiral Lezcano, in an action off Otranto, which consequently left the seas open to the supplies daily expected from Sicily. Fortune seemed now in the giving vein, for in a few days a convoy of seven transports from that island, laden with grain, meat, and other stores, came safe into Barleta, and supplied abundant means for recruiting the health and spirits of its famished inmates.*

Thus restored, the Spaniards began to look forward with eager confidence to the achievement of some new enterprise. The temerity of the viceroy soon afforded an opportunity. The people of Castellaneta, a town near Tarento, were driven by the insolent and licentious behaviour of the French garrison to betray the place into the hands of the Spaniards. The Duke of Nemours, enraged at this defection, prepared to march at once with his whole force and take signal vengeance on the devoted little town; and this, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his officers against a step which must inevitably expose the unprotected garrisons in the neighbourhood to the assault of their vigilant enemy in Barleta. The event justified these apprehensions.†

No sooner had Gonsalvo learned the departure of

session of a magazine of corn in Foggia, sold it to the Venetian merchant, instead of reserving it, where it was most needed, for his own army.

* Auton, P. i. ch. lxxii. — Pet. Martyr, ep. ccliv. — Jovii Vitæ, p. 242.

† Guicciardini, lib. v. p. 296. — Auton, P. ii. ch. xxxi.

Nemours on a distant expedition, than he resolved at once to make an attack on the town of Ruvo, about twelve miles distant, and defended by the brave La Palice, with a corps of 300 French lances and as many foot. February 22nd, 1503. With his usual promptness, the Spanish general quitted the walls of Barleta the same night on which he received the news, taking with him his whole effective force, amounting to about 3000 infantry and 1,000 light and heavy armed horse. So few, indeed, remained to guard the city, that he thought it prudent to take some of the principal inhabitants as hostages to insure its fidelity in his absence.

At break of day, the little army arrived before Ruvo. Gonsalvo immediately opened a lively cannonade on the old ramparts, which in less than four hours effected a considerable breach. He then led his men to the assault, taking charge himself of those who were to storm the breach; while another division, armed with ladders for scaling the walls, was intrusted to the adventurous cavalier Diego de Paredes.

The assailants experienced more resolute resistance than they had anticipated from the inconsiderable number of the garrison. La Palice, throwing himself into the breach with his iron band of dismounted gendarmes, drove back the Spaniards as often as they attempted to set foot on the broken ramparts; while the Gascon archery showered down volleys of arrows thick as hail from the battlements on the exposed persons of the assailants. The latter, however, soon rallied under the eye of their general, and returned with fresh fury to the charge, until the overwhelming tide of numbers bore down all opposition, and they poured in through the breach and over the walls with irresistible fury. The brave little garrison was driven before them; still, however, occasionally making fight in the streets and houses. Their intrepid young commander, La Palice, retreated facing the enemy, who pressed thick and close upon him, till, his further progress being arrested by a wall, he placed his back against it, and kept them at bay, making a wide circle around him with the deadly sweep of his battleaxe. But the odds were too much for him; and at length, after repeated wounds, having been brought to the ground by a deep cut in the head, he was made prisoner; not, however, before he had flung his sword far over the heads of the assailants, disdaining, in the true spirit of a knight-errant, to yield it to the rabble around him.*

All resistance was now at an end. The females

* Jovii Vitæ, pp. 248, 249. — Guicciardini, p. 296. — Bernaldez, MS. ch. clxxv.—Auton, P. ii. ch. xxxi.—Chron. del Gr. Capitan, cap. lxxii.

The gallant behaviour of Palice, and indeed the whole siege of Ruvo, is told by Jean d'Auton in a truly heart-stirring tone, quite worthy of the chivalrous pen of old Froissart. There is an inexpressible charm imparted to the French memoirs and chronicles of this ancient date, not only from the picturesque character of the details, but from a gentle tinge of romance shed over them, which calls to mind the doughty feats of

—————“prowest knights, “Both Paynim and the peers of Charlemagne.”

of the place had fled like so many frightened deer to one of the principal churches ; and Gonsalvo, with more humanity than usual in these barbarous wars, placed a guard over their persons which effectually secured them from the insults of the soldiery. After a short time spent in gathering up the booty, and securing his prisoners, the Spanish general, having achieved the object of his expedition, set out on his homeward march, and arrived without interruption at Barleta.

The Duke of Nemours had scarcely appeared before Castellaneta, before he received tidings of the attack on Ruvo. He put himself, without losing a moment, at the head of his gendarmes, supported by the Swiss pikemen, hoping to reach the beleaguered town in time to raise the siege. Great was his astonishment, therefore, on arriving before it, to find no trace of an enemy, except the ensigns of Spain unfurled from the deserted battlements. Mortified and dejected, he made no further attempt to recover Castellaneta, but silently drew off to hide his chagrin in the walls of Canosa.*

Among the prisoners were several persons of distinguished rank. Gonsalvo treated them with his usual courtesy, and especially La Palice, whom he provided with his own surgeon and all the appliances for rendering his situation as comfortable as possible. For the common file, however, he showed no such sympathy ; but condemned them all to serve in the Spanish admiral's galleys, where they continued to the close of the campaign. An unfortunate misunderstanding had long subsisted between the French and Spanish commanders respecting the ransom and exchange of prisoners ; and Gonsalvo was probably led to this severe measure, so different from his usual clemency, by an unwillingness to encumber himself with a superfluous population in the besieged city.* But, in truth, such a proceeding, however offensive to humanity, was not at all repugnant to the haughty spirit of chivalry, which, reserving its courtesies exclusively for those of gentle blood and high degree, cared little for the inferior orders, whether soldier or peasant, whom it abandoned without remorse to all the caprices and cruelties of military license.

* Bernaldez, MS. ubi. sup.—Ulloa, fol. 16.—Chronica del. Gr. Capitan, cap. lxxii.

The capture of Ruvo was attended with important consequences to the Spaniards. Besides a valuable booty of clothes, jewels, and money, they brought back with them nearly a thousand horses, which furnished Gonsalvo with the means of augmenting his cavalry, whose small number had hitherto materially crippled his operations. He accordingly selected 700 of his best troops and mounted them on the French horses ; thus providing himself with a corps, burning with zeal to approve itself worthy of the distinguished honour conferred on it.†

* Auton, ubi sup. — Jovii ii. p. 270.—Zurita, Hist. tom. i. Vitæ, p. 249.—Quintana, tom. lib. v. cap. xiv.

† Jovii Vitæ, p. 249.

A few weeks after this, the general received an important accession of strength from the arrival of 2,000 German mercenaries, which Don Juan Manuel, the Spanish minister at the Austrian court, had been permitted to raise in the emperor's dominions. This event determined the Great Captain on a step which he had been some time meditating. The new levies placed him in a condition for assuming the offensive. His stock of provisions, moreover, already much reduced, would be obviously insufficient long to maintain his increased numbers. He resolved, therefore, to sally out of the old walls of Barleta, and, availing himself of the high spirits in which the late successes had put his troops, to bring the enemy at once to battle.*

* Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xv.—Zurita, tom. i. lib. v. cap. xvi.—Ulloa, fol. 17.

CHAPTER XII.

ITALIAN WARS.—NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE.—VICTORY OF CERIGNOLA.—SURRENDER OF NAPLES.

1503.

BEFORE accompanying the Great Captain further in his warlike operations, it will be necessary to take a rapid glance at what was passing in the French and Spanish courts, where negotiations were in train for putting a stop to them altogether.

The reader has been made acquainted in a preceding chapter with the marriage of the Infanta Joanna, second daughter of the Catholic sovereigns, with the Archduke Philip, son of the Emperor Maximilian, and sovereign, in right of his mother, of the Low Countries. The first fruit of this marriage was the celebrated Charles V, born at Ghent, February 24th, 1500, whose birth was no sooner announced to Queen Isabella, than she predicted that to this infant would one day descend the rich inheritance of the Spanish monarchy.* The premature death of the heir apparent, Prince Miguel, not long after, prepared the way for this event by devolving the succession on Joanna, Charles's mother. From that moment the sovereigns were pressing in their entreaties that the archduke and his wife would visit Spain, that they might receive the customary oaths of allegiance, and that the former might become acquainted with the character and institutions of his future subjects. The giddy young prince, however, thought too much of present pleasure to heed the call of ambition or duty, and suffered more than a year to glide away before he complied with the summons of his royal parents.

* Galindez de Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1500.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 2.

The queen expressed herself in the language of Scripture, "Sors cecidit super Mathiam,"

In the latter part of 1501, Philip and Joanna, attended by a numerous suite of Flemish courtiers, set out on their journey, proposing to take their way through France. They were entertained with profuse magnificence and hospitality at the French court, where the politic attentions of Louis XII. not only effaced the recollection of ancient injuries to the house of Burgundy,* but left impressions of the most agreeable character on the mind in allusion to the circumstance of Charles being born on that saint's day ; a day which, if we are to believe Garibay, was fortunate to him through the whole course of his life. Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. ix.

* Charles VIII, Louis's predecessor, had contrived to secure the hand of Anne of Bretagne, notwithstanding she was already married by proxy to Philip's father, the Emperor Maximilian ; and this, too, in contempt of his own engagements to Margaret, the emperor's daughter, to whom he had been affianced from her infancy. This twofold insult, which sunk deep into the heart of Maximilian, seems to have made no impression on the volatile spirits of his son.

of the young prince.* After some weeks passed in a succession of splendid fêtes and amusements at Blois, where the archduke confirmed the treaty of Trent recently made between his father the emperor and the French king, stipulating the marriage of Louis's eldest daughter, the Princess Claude, with Philip's son Charles, the royal pair resumed their journey towards Spain, which they entered by the way of Fontarabia, January 29th, 1502.†

Magnificent preparations had been made for their reception. The Grand Constable of Castile, the Duke of Naxara, and many other of the principal grandees, waited on the borders to receive them. Brilliant fêtes and illuminations, and all the usual marks of public rejoicing, greeted their progress through the principal cities of the North; and a pragmatica relaxing the simplicity, or rather severity, of the sump-

* Mariana, lib. xxvii. cap. xi. — St. Gelais describes the cordial reception of Philip and Joanna by the court at Blois, where he was probably present himself. The historian shows his own opinion of the effect produced on their young minds by these flattering attentions, by remarking, "Le roy leur monstra si tres grand semblant d'amour, que par noblesse et honesteté de cœur il les obligeoit envers luy de leur en souvenir toute leur vie." Hist. de Louis XII. pp. 164, 165.

In passing through Paris, Philip took his seat in the parliament as peer of France, and subsequently did homage to Louis XII. as his suzerain for his estates in Flanders; an acknowledgment of inferiority not at all palatable to the Spanish historians, who insist, with much satisfaction, on the haughty refusal of his wife the archduchess to take part in the ceremony. Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. iv. c. lv. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1502. — Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xiii. sec. i. — Dumont, Corps Universal Diplomatique, tom. iv. P. i. p. 17.

† Galindez de Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1502. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 5.

tuary laws of the period, so far as to allow the use of silks and various coloured apparel, shows the attention of the sovereigns to every circumstance, however trifling, which could affect the minds of the young princes agreeably, and diffuse an air of cheerfulness over the scene.*

Ferdinand and Isabella, who were occupied with the affairs of Andalusia at this period, no sooner heard of the arrival of Philip and Joanna than they hastened towards the North. They reached Toledo towards the end of April, and, in a few days, the queen, who paid the usual penalties of royalty in seeing her children one after another removed far from her into distant lands, had the satisfaction of again folding her beloved daughter in her arms.

On the 22nd of the ensuing month, the archduke and his wife received the usual oaths of fealty from the cortes duly convoked for the purpose at Toledo.† King Ferdinand, not long after, made a journey into Aragon, in which the queen's feeble health would not permit her to accompany him, in order to prepare the way for a similar recognition by the estates of that realm. We are

* Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. iv. cap. lv. — Ferreras, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. viii. p. 220.

This extreme simplicity of attire, in which Zurita discerns "the modesty of the times," was enforced by laws, the policy of which, whatever be thought of their moral import, may well be doubted in an economical view. I shall have occasion to draw the reader's attention to them hereafter.

† The writ is dated at Llerena, March 8. It is extracted by Marina from the archives of Toledo. Teoría de las Cortes, tom. ii. p. 18.

not informed what arguments the sagacious monarch made use of to dispel the scruples formerly entertained by that independent body on a similar application in behalf of his daughter, the late Queen of Portugal.* They were completely successful, however; and Philip and Joanna, having ascertained the favourable disposition of cortes, made their entrance in great state into the ancient city of Saragossa, in the month of October. On the 27th, having first made oath before the justice to observe the laws and liberties of the realm, Joanna as future queen proprietor, and Philip as her husband, were solemnly recognised by the four arms of Aragon as successors to the crown, in default of male issue of King Ferdinand. The circum-

* It is remarkable that the Aragonese writers, generally so inquisitive on all points touching the constitutional history of their country, should have omitted to notice the grounds on which the cortes thought proper to reverse its former decision in the analogous case of the Infanta Isabella. There seems to have been even less reason for departing from ancient usage in the present instance, since Joanna had a son, to whom cortes might lawfully have tendered its oath of recognition; for a female, although excluded from the throne in her own person, was regarded as competent to transmit the title unimpaired to her male heirs. Blancas suggests no explanation of the affair, (Coronaciones de Aragon, lib. iii. c. xx. and Commentarii, pp. 274. 511,) and Zurita quietly dismisses it with the remark that "there was some opposition raised, but the king had managed it so discreetly beforehand that there was not the same difficulty as formerly." (Hist. de Hernando, tom. i. lib. v. cap. v.) It is curious to see with what effrontery the prothonotary of the cortes, in the desire to varnish over the departure from constitutional precedent, declares, in the opening address, "the Princess Joanna true and lawful heir to the crown, to whom, in default of male heirs, the usage and law of the land require the oath of allegiance." Coronacion. de Arag. ubi supra.

stance is memorable, as affording the first example of the parliamentary recognition of a female heir apparent in Aragonese history.*

Amidst all the honours so liberally lavished on Philip, his bosom secretly swelled with discontent, fomented still further by his followers, who pressed him to hasten his return to Flanders, where the free and social manners of the people were much more congenial to their tastes, than the reserve and stately ceremonial of the Spanish court. The young prince shared in these feelings, to which, indeed, the love of pleasure, and an instinctive aversion to any thing like serious occupation, naturally disposed him. Ferdinand and Isabella saw with regret the frivolous disposition of their son-in-law, who, in the indulgence of selfish and effeminate ease, was willing to repose on others all the important duties of government. They beheld with mortification his indifference to Joanna, who could boast few personal attractions,† and who cooled the affections

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1500. — Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xii. sec. vi.—Robles, Vida de Ximenes, p. 126.—Garibay, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. c. xiv. —Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. v.

Petronilla, the only female who ever sat, in her own right, on the throne of Aragon, never received the homage of cortes as heir apparent; the custom not having been established at that time, the middle of the twelfth century. (Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. v. cap. v.) Blancas has described the ceremony of Joanna's recognition with quite as much circumstantiality as the novelty of the case could warrant. Coronaciones, lib. iii. cap. xx.

† "Simplex est fœmina," says Martyr, speaking of Joanna, "licet à tantâ muliere progenita." Opus Epistolarum, ep. ccl.

of her husband by alternations of excessive fondness and irritable jealousy, for which last the levity of his conduct gave her too much occasion.

Shortly after the ceremony at Saragossa, the archduke announced his intention of an immediate return to the Netherlands by the way of France. The sovereigns, astonished at this abrupt determination, used every argument to dissuade him from it. They represented the ill effects it might occasion the Princess Joanna, then too far advanced in a state of pregnancy to accompany him. They pointed out the impropriety, as well as danger, of committing himself to the hands of the French king, with whom they were now at open war; and they finally insisted on the importance of Philip's remaining long enough in the kingdom to become familiar with the usages, and establish himself in the affections of the people, over whom he would one day be called to reign.

All these arguments were ineffectual; the inflexible prince, turning a deaf ear alike to the entreaties of his unhappy wife, and the remonstrances of the Aragonese cortes still in session, set out from Madrid, with the whole of his Flemish suite, in the month of December. He left Ferdinand and Isabella disgusted with the levity of his conduct, and the queen, in particular, filled with mournful solicitude for the welfare of the daughter with whom his destinies were united.*

* Martyr, ubi supra.—Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. x.—Alvar. Gomecius, De Rebus Gestis

Ximenii, fol. 44.—Carbajal, MS. año 1502.

Before his departure for France, Philip, anxious to reëstablish harmony between that country and Spain, offered his services to his father-in-law in negotiating with Louis XII, if possible, a settlement of the differences respecting Naples. Ferdinand showed some reluctance at intrusting so delicate a commission to an envoy in whose discretion he placed small reliance, which was not augmented by the known partiality which Philip entertained for the French monarch.* Before the archduke had crossed the frontier, however, he was overtaken by a Spanish ecclesiastic named Bernaldo Boil, abbot of St. Miguel de Cuxa, who brought full powers from the king to Philip for concluding a treaty with France, accompanied at the same time with private instructions of the most strict and limited nature. He was enjoined, moreover, to take no step without the advice of his reverend coadjutor, and to inform the Spanish court at once, if different propositions were submitted from those contemplated by his instructions.†

Thus fortified, the Archduke Philip made his appearance at the French court in Lyons, where he was received by Louis with the same lively expres-

* Such manifest partiality for the French court and manners was shown by Philip and his Flemish followers, that the Spaniards very generally believed the latter were in the pay of Louis XII. See Alvarus Gomecius, fol. 44. — Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. xxiii. —

Martyr, ep. ccli. — Lanuza, cap. xvi.

† Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. v. cap. x. — Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xiii. sec. ii. — Garibay, Compend. Hist. tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xv. — Auton, Hist. de Louis XII. P. ii. chap. xxxii.

sions of regard as before. With these amiable dispositions, the negotiations were not long in resulting in a definitive treaty, arranged to the mutual satisfaction of the parties, though, in violation of the private instructions of the archduke. In the progress of the discussions, Ferdinand received advices from his envoy, the Abate Boil, that Philip was transcending his commission; in consequence of which the king sent an express to France, urging his son-in-law to adhere to the strict letter of his instructions. Before the messenger reached Lyons, however, the treaty was executed. Such is the Spanish account of this blind transaction.*

The treaty, which was signed at Lyons, April 5th, 1503, was arranged on the basis of the marriage of Charles, the infant son of Philip, and Claude, Princess of France; a marriage which, settled by three several treaties, was destined never to take place. The royal infants were immediately to assume the titles of King and Queen of Naples, and Duke and Duchess of Calabria. Until the consummation of the marriage, the French division of the kingdom

* Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. v. cap. xxiii.—St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. pp. 170, 171.—Claude Seyssel, Hist. de Louis XII. p. 108.—Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xiii. sec. iii.—Mariana, tom. ii. pp. 690, 691.—Lanuza, Annales Eccles. y Seglar. tom. i. cap. xvi.

Some of the French historians speak of two agents besides Philip employed in the negotiations. Father Boil is the only one named as regularly commissioned for the purpose, by the Spanish writers; although it is not improbable that Gralla, the resident minister at Louis's court, took part in the discussions.

was to be placed under the administration of some suitable person named by Louis XII, and the Spanish under that of the Archduke Philip, or some other deputy appointed by Ferdinand. All places unlawfully seized by either party were to be restored; and lastly it was settled, with regard to the disputed province of the Capitanate, that the portion held by the French should be governed by an agent of King Louis, and the Spanish by the Archduke Philip on behalf of Ferdinand.*

Such in substance was the treaty of Lyons; a treaty which, while it seemed to consult the interests of Ferdinand, by securing the throne of Naples eventually to his posterity, was in fact far more accommodated to those of Louis, by placing the immediate control of the Spanish moiety under a prince over whom that monarch held entire influence. It is impossible that so shrewd a statesman as Ferdinand could have seriously contemplated an arrangement which surrendered all the actual power into the hands of his rival, from the mere consideration of advantages so remote to himself, and dependent on so precarious a contingency as the marriage of two infants then in their cradles; and that too at the moment when his large armament, so long preparing for Calabria, had reached that country, and when the Great Captain, on the other quarter, had received such accessions of strength as enabled him to assume the offensive on at least equal terms with the enemy.

* See the treaty ap. Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. pp. 27—29.

No misgivings on this head, however, appear to have entered the minds of the signers of the treaty, which was celebrated by the court at Lyons with every show of public rejoicing, and particularly with tourneys and tilts of reeds, in imitation of the Spanish chivalry. At the same time, the French king countermanded the embarkation of fresh troops on board a fleet equipping at the port of Genoa for Naples, and sent orders to his generals in Italy to desist from further operations. The archduke forwarded similar instructions to Gonsalvo, accompanied with a copy of the powers intrusted to him by Ferdinand. That prudent officer, however, whether in obedience to previous directions from the king, as Spanish writers affirm, or on his own responsibility, from a very natural sense of duty, refused to comply with the ambassador's orders; declaring "he knew no authority but that of his own sovereigns, and that he felt bound to prosecute the war with all his ability till he received their commands to the contrary.*

* Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. c. xiii. sec. iii. —Giannone, Istoria di Napoli, lib. xxix. c. iv. —St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. p. 171. —Buonaccorsi, Diario, P. 75. —Auton, Hist. de Louis XII. P. ii. ch. xxxii.

According to the Aragonese historians, Ferdinand, on the archduke's departure, informed

Gonsalvo of the intended negotiations with France, cautioning the general at the same time not to heed any instructions of the archduke till confirmed by him. This circumstance the French writers regard as unequivocal proof of the king's insincerity in entering into the negotiation. It wears this aspect at first, certainly; but, on

Indeed, the archduke's despatches arrived at the very time when the Spanish general, having strengthened himself by a reinforcement from the neighbouring garrison of Tarento under Pedro Navarro, was prepared to sally forth, and try his fortune in battle with the enemy. Without further delay, he put his purpose into execution, and, on Friday the 28th of April 1503, marched out with his whole army from the ancient walls of Barleta; a spot ever memorable in history as the scene of the extraordinary sufferings and indomitable constancy of the Spanish soldier.

The road lay across the field of Cannæ, where, seventeen centuries before, the pride of Rome had nearer view, admits of a very different construction. Ferdinand had no confidence in the discretion of his envoy, whom, if we are to believe the Spanish writers, he employed in the affair more from accident than choice, and, notwithstanding the full powers intrusted to him, did not consider himself bound to recognise the validity of any treaty which the other should sign, until first ratified by himself. With these views, founded on principles now universally recognised in European diplomacy, it was natural to caution his general against any unauthorized interference on the part of his envoy, which the rash and presumptuous character of the latter, acting, moreover, under an undue influence of the French monarch, gave him good reason to fear.

As to the Great Captain, who has borne a liberal share of censure on this occasion, it is not easy to see how he could have acted otherwise than he did, even in the event of no special instructions from Ferdinand. For he would scarcely have been justified in abandoning a sure prospect of advantage on the authority of one, the validity of whose powers he could not determine, and which, in fact, do not appear to have warranted such interference. The only authority he knew, was that from which he held his commission, and to which he was responsible for the faithful discharge of it.

been humbled by the victorious arms of Hannibal,* in a battle which, though fought with far greater numbers, was not so decisive in its consequences as that which the same scenes were to witness in a few hours. The coincidence is certainly singular; and one might almost fancy that the actors in these fearful tragedies, unwilling to deface the fair haunts of civilization, had purposely sought a more fitting theatre in this obscure and sequestered region.

The weather, although only at the latter end of April, was extremely sultry; the troops, notwithstanding Gonsalvo's orders on crossing the river Ofanto, the ancient Aufidus, had failed to supply themselves with sufficient water for the march: parched with heat and dust, they were soon distressed by excessive thirst, and, as the burning rays of the noontide sun beat fiercely on their heads, many of them, especially those cased in heavy armour, sunk down on the road, fainting with ex-

* Neither Polybius, (lib. iii. sec. xxiv. et seq.) nor Livy, (Hist. lib. xxii. cap. xliii—l.) who give the most circumstantial narratives of the battle, are precise enough to enable us to ascertain the exact spot in which it was fought. Strabo, in his topographical notices of this part of Italy, briefly alludes to the "Cannensis clades," without any particular reference to the scene of action. (Geogr. lib. vi. p. 285.) Cluverius fixes the site of the ancient Cannæ on the right bank of the Aufidus, the modern Ofanto, between three and four miles below Canusium; and notices the modern hamlet of nearly the same name, Canne, where common tradition recognises the ruins of the ancient town. (Italia Antiq. lib. iv. cap. xii. s. viii.) D'Anville makes no difficulty in identifying this with the latter, (Geogr. Ancienne, tom. i. p. 208,) which he has laid down in his maps in the direct line, and about midway, between Barleta and Cernignola.

haustion and fatigue. Gonsalvo was seen in every quarter, administering to the necessities of his men, and striving to re-animate their drooping spirits. At length, to relieve them, he commanded that each trooper should take one of the infantry on his crupper, setting the example himself by mounting a German ensign behind him on his own horse.

In this way, the whole army arrived early in the afternoon before Cerignola, a small town on an eminence about sixteen miles from Barleta, where the nature of the ground afforded the Spanish general a favourable position for his camp. The sloping sides of the hill were covered with vineyards, and its base was protected by a ditch of considerable depth. Gonsalvo saw at once the advantages of the ground. His men were jaded by the march ; but there was no time to lose, as the French, who had been drawn up under the walls of Canosa, on his departure from Barleta, were now rapidly advancing. All hands were put in requisition, therefore, for widening the trench, in which they planted sharp-pointed stakes ; while the earth which they excavated enabled them to throw up a parapet of considerable height on the side next the town. On this rampart he mounted his little train of artillery, consisting of thirteen guns, and behind it drew up his forces in order of battle.*

* P. Jovii Vitæ Illust. Vir. fol. 253—255. — Guicciardini, lib. v. p. 303. — Chronica del Gran Capitan, cap. lxxv. lxxvi.—

Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. xxvii. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclvi.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 16, 17. Giovio

Before these movements were completed in the Spanish camp, the bright arms and banners of the French were seen glistening in the distance amid the tall fennel and cane-brakes with which the country was thickly covered. As soon as they had come in view of the Spanish encampment, they were brought to a halt, while a council of war was called to determine the expediency of giving battle that evening. The Duke of Nemours would have deferred it till the following morning, as the day was already far spent, and allowed no time for reconnoitring the position of his enemy. But Ives d'Allègre, Chandieu the commander of the Swiss, and some other officers, were for immediate action, representing the importance of not balking the impatience of the soldiers, who were all hot for the assault. In the course of the debate, Allègre was so much heated as to throw out some rash taunts on the courage of the viceroy, which the latter would have avenged on the spot, had not his arm been arrested by Louis d'Ars. He had the weakness, however, to suffer them to change his cooler purpose, exclaiming, "We will fight to-night then, and perhaps those who vaunt the loudest will be found to Giovio says, that he had heard Fabricio Colonna remark more than once, in allusion to the intrenchments at the base of the hill, "That the victory was owing, not to the skill of the commander, nor the valour of the troops, but to a mound and a ditch." This ancient mode of securing a position, which had fallen into disuse, was revived after this, according to the same author, and came into general practice among the best captains of the age. Loc. cit.

trust more to their spurs, than their swords ;” a prediction bitterly justified by the event.*

While this dispute was going on, Gonsalvo gained time for making the necessary disposition of his troops. In the centre he placed his German auxiliaries, armed with their long pikes, and on each wing the Spanish infantry under the command of Pedro Navarro, Diego de Paredes, Pizarro, and other illustrious captains. The defence of the artillery was committed to the left wing. A considerable body of men-at-arms, including those recently equipped from the spoils of Ruvo, was drawn up within the intrenchments, in a quarter affording a convenient opening for a sally, and placed under the orders of Mendoza and Fabricio Colonna, whose brother Prospero and Pedro de la Paz took charge of the light cavalry, which was posted without the lines to annoy the advance of the enemy, and act on any point as occasion might require. Having completed his preparations, the Spanish general coolly waited the assault of the French.

The Duke de Nemours had marshalled his forces in a very different order. He distributed them into three battles or divisions, stationing his heavy horse, composing altogether, as Gonsalvo declared, “ the finest body of cavalry seen for many years in Italy,” under the command of Louis d’Ars, on the right.

* Brantôme, Œuvres, tom. ii. et d’Esp. tom. iv. p. 244.—St. Die. viii. — Garnier, Hist. de Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. p. France, tom. v. pp. 395, 396. 171.
—Gaillard, Rivalité de France

The second and centre division, formed somewhat in rear of the right, was made up of the Swiss and Gascon infantry, headed by the brave Chandieu; and his left, consisting chiefly of his light cavalry, and drawn up like the last, somewhat in the rear of the preceding, was intrusted to Allègre.*

It was within half an hour of sunset when the Duke de Nemours gave orders for the attack, and, putting himself at the head of the gendarmerie on the right, spurred at full gallop against the Spanish left. The hostile armies were nearly equal, amounting to between six and seven thousand men each. The French were superior in the number and condition of their cavalry, rising to a third of their whole force; while Gonsalvo's strength lay chiefly in his infantry, which had acquired a lesson of tactics under him that raised it to a level with the best in Europe.

As the French advanced, the guns on the Spanish left poured a lively fire into their ranks, when a spark accidentally communicating with the magazine of powder, the whole blew up with a tremendous explosion. The Spaniards were filled with consternation; but Gonsalvo, converting the misfortune into a lucky omen, called out, "Courage, soldiers, these are the beacon lights of victory! we have no need of our guns at close quarters."

In the mean time, the French van, under Ne-

* Chronica del Gr. Capitan, 253—255. — Ulloa, Carlo V. cap. lxxvi. — P. Jovii Vitæ, fol. fol. 17.

mours, advancing rapidly under the dark clouds of smoke, which rolled heavily over the field, were unexpectedly brought up by the deep trench, of whose existence they were unapprised. Some of the horse were precipitated into it, and all received a sudden check, until Nemours, finding it impossible to force the works in this quarter, rode along their front in search of some practicable passage. In doing this, he necessarily exposed his flank to the fatal aim of the Spanish arquebussiers. A shot from one of them took effect on the unfortunate young nobleman, and he fell mortally wounded from his saddle.

At this juncture, the Swiss and Gascon infantry, briskly moving up to second the attack of the now disordered horse, arrived before the intrenchments. Undismayed by this formidable barrier, their commander Chandieu made the most desperate attempts to force a passage ; but the loose earth freshly turned up afforded no hold to the feet, and his men were compelled to recoil from the dense array of German pikes which bristled over the summit of the breast-work. Chandieu, their leader, made every effort to rally and bring them back to the charge, but in the act of doing this was hit by a ball, which stretched him lifeless in the ditch ; his burnished arms, and the snow-white plumes above his helmet, making him a conspicuous mark for the enemy.

All was now confusion. The Spanish arquebussiers, screened by their defences, poured a galling fire into the dense masses of the enemy, who were mingled together indiscriminately, horse and foot ; while, the leaders being down, no one seemed capable of bringing them to order. At this critical moment, Gonsalvo, whose eagle eye took in the whole operations of the field, ordered a general charge along the line, and the Spaniards, leaping their intrenchments, descended with the fury of an avalanche on their foes, whose wavering columns, completely broken by the violence of the shock, were seized with a panic and fled, scarcely offering any resistance. Louis d'Ars, at the head of such of the men-at-arms as could follow him, went off in one direction, and Ives d'Allègre, with his light cavalry, which had hardly come into action, in another ; thus fully verifying the ominous prediction of his commander. The slaughter fell most heavily on the Swiss and German foot, whom the cavalry under Mendoza and Pedro de la Paz rode down and cut to pieces without sparing, till the shades of evening shielded them at length from their pitiless pursuers.*

Prospero Colonna pushed on to the French encampment, where he found the tables in the duke's tent spread for his evening repast ; of which the Italian general and his followers did not fail to make good account. A trifling incident, that well illustrates the sudden reverses of war.

* Chron. del Gr. Capitan, cap. lxxv. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 396, 397. — Mém. de Fleurange, ch. v. ap. Coll. des Mém. Françaises, tom. xvi. — P. Jovii Vitæ Illust. Vir.

ubi supra. — Guicciardini, Ist. d'Italia, tom. i. pp. 303, 304. — St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. pp. 171, 172. — Brantôme, tom. ii. Disc. viii.

The Great Captain passed the night on the field of battle, which on the following morning presented a ghastly spectacle of the dying and the dead. More than 3000 French are computed by the best accounts to have fallen. The loss of the Spaniards, covered as they were by their defences, was inconsiderable.* All the enemy's artillery, consisting of thirteen pieces, his baggage, and most of his colours, fell into their hands. Never was there a more complete victory, achieved too within the space of little more than an hour. The body of the unfortunate Nemours, which was recognised by one of his pages from the rings on the fingers, was found under a heap of slain, much disfigured. It appeared that he had received three several wounds, disproving, if need were, by his honourable death the injurious taunts of Allègre. Gonsalvo was affected even to tears at beholding the mutilated remains of his young and gallant adversary;

* P. Jovii Vitæ, fol. 255.—Garibay, Compend. Hist. de Esp. tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xv.—Bernaldez, Hist. de los Reyes Catol. MS. cap. clxxx.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclvi.—Mém. de Fleurange, ch. v.

No account, that I know of, places the French loss so low as 3000; Garibay raises it to 4500, and the French Maréchal De Fleurange rates that of the Swiss alone at 5000; a round exaggeration not readily accounted for, as he had undoubted access to the best means of information. The Spaniards were too well screened to sustain much injury, and no estimate makes it more than a hundred killed, and some considerably less. The odds are indeed startling, but not impossible; as the Spaniards were not much exposed by personal collision with the enemy, until the latter were thrown into too much disorder to think of any thing but escape. The more than usual confusion and discrepancy in the various statements of the particulars of this action may probably be attributed to the lateness of the hour, and imperfect light consequently, in which it was fought.

who, whatever judgment may be formed of his capacity as a leader, was allowed to have all the qualities which belong to a true knight. With him perished the last scion of the illustrious house of Armagnac. Gonsalvo ordered his remains to be conveyed to Barleta, where they were laid in the cemetery of the convent of St. Francis, with all the honours due to his high station.*

The Spanish commander lost no time in following up his blow, well aware that it is quite as difficult to improve a victory as to win one. The French had rushed into battle with too much precipitation to agree on any plan of operations, or any point on which to rally in case of defeat. They accordingly scattered in different directions, and Pedro de la Paz was despatched in pursuit of Louis d'Ars, who threw himself into Venosa,† where he kept the enemy at bay for many months longer. Paredes kept close on the scent of Allègre, who, finding the gates shut against him wherever he passed, at length took shelter in Gaeta on the extreme point of the Neapolitan territory. There he endeavoured to rally the scattered relics of the field of Cerignola, and to establish a strong position, from which the French, when strengthened by fresh supplies from home, might recommence operations for the recovery of the kingdom.

* Quintana, Vidas de Españ. Celeb. tom. i. p. 277.—P. Jovii Illust. Vir. fol. 255.—Ferrerias, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. viii. pp. 248, 249.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 17.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. clxxxi.

† It was to this same city of Venusium that the rash and unfortunate Varro made his retreat, some seventeen centuries before, from the bloody field of Cannæ. Liv. Hist. lib. xxii. cap. xlix.

The day after the battle of Cerignola, the Spaniards received tidings of another victory, scarcely less important, gained over the French in Calabria, the preceding week.* The army sent out under Portocarrero had reached that coast early in March ; but, soon after its arrival, its gallant commander fell ill and died.† The dying general named Don Fernando de Andrada as his successor ; and this officer combining his forces with those before in the country under Cardona and Benavides, encountered the French commander D'Aubigny in a pitched battle, not far from Seminara, on Friday the 21st of April. It was near the same spot on which the latter had twice beaten the Spaniards. But the star of France was on the wane, and the gallant old officer had the

* P. Jovii Vitæ Ill. Viror. fol. 255. — Martyr, Opus Epistolar. ep. cclvi. — Chron. del Gr. Capitan, c. lxxx.

Friday, says Guicciardini, aluding no doubt to Columbus's discoveries, as well as these two victories, was observed to be a lucky day to the Spaniards : according to Gaillard, it was regarded from this time by the French with more superstitious dread than ever. Istor. d'Italia, tom. i. p. 304. — Rivalité de Fr. et d'Espagne, tom. iv. p. 348.

† Zurita, Hist. de Hernando, tom. i. lib. v. c. viii. xxiv. — P. Jovii Vitæ Illust. Vir. fol. 250.

The reader may perhaps recollect the distinguished part played in the Moorish war by Louis Portocarrero, lord of Palma. He was of noble Italian origin, being descended from the ancient Genoese house of Bocanegra. The Great Captain and he had married sisters ; and this connexion probably recommended him, as much as his military talents, to the Calabrian command, which it was highly important should be intrusted to one who would maintain a good understanding with the commander-in-chief ; a thing not easy to secure among the haughty nobility of Castile.

mortification to see his little corps of veterans completely routed after a sharp engagement of less than an hour, while he himself was retrieved with difficulty from the hands of the enemy by the valour of his Scottish guard.*

The Great Captain and his army, highly elated with the news of this fortunate event, which annihilated the French power in Calabria, began their march on Naples, Fabricio Colonna having been first detached into the Abruzzi to receive the submission of the people in that quarter. The tidings of the victory had spread far and wide, and, as Gonzalvo's army advanced, they beheld the ensigns of Aragon floating from the battlements of the towns upon their route, while the inhabitants came forth to greet the conqueror, eager to testify their devotion to the Spanish cause. The army halted at Benevento; and the general sent his summons to the city of Naples, inviting it in the most courteous terms to resume its ancient allegiance to the legitimate branch of Aragon. It was hardly to be expected that the allegiance of a people, who had so long seen their country set up as a mere stake for political gamesters, should sit very closely upon them, or that they should care to peril their lives on the transfer of a crown which had shifted on the heads of half a

* P. Jovii Vitæ, fol. 255.—
P. Martyr, ep. cclvi.—Chron. del
Gr. Capitan, cap. lxxx.—Va-rillas, Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i.
pp. 289—292.

See the account of D'Aubigny's victories at Seminara in Part ii. chap. ii. and xi. of this History.

dozen proprietors in as many successive years.* With the same ductile enthusiasm, therefore, with which they greeted the accession of Charles VIII. or Louis XII, they now welcomed the restoration of the ancient dynasty of Aragon ; and deputies from the principal nobility and citizens waited on the Great Captain at Acerra, where they tendered him the keys of the city, and requested the confirmation of their rights and privileges.

Gonsalvo, having promised this in the name of his royal master, on the following morning, the 14th of May, 1503, made his entrance in great state into the capital, leaving his army without the walls. He was escorted by the military of the city under a royal canopy borne by the deputies. The streets were strewn with flowers, the edifices decorated with appropriate emblems and devices, and wreathed with banners emblazoned with the united arms of Aragon and Naples. As he passed along, the city rung with the acclamations of countless multitudes who thronged the streets, while every window and housetop was filled with spectators eager to behold the man who, with scarcely any other resources than those of his own genius, had so long defied, and at length completely foiled, the power of France!

* Since 1494 the sceptre of Naples had passed into the hands of no less than seven princes, Ferdinand I, Alphonso II, Ferdinand II, Charles VIII, Frederic III, Louis XII, Ferdinand the Catholic. No private estate in the kingdom in the same time had probably changed masters half so often.

On the following day a deputation of the nobility and people waited on the Great Captain at his quarters, and tendered him the usual oaths of allegiance for his master, King Ferdinand, whose accession finally closed the series of revolutions which had so long agitated this unhappy country.*

The city of Naples was commanded by two strong fortresses still held by the French, which, being well victualled and supplied with ammunition, showed no disposition to surrender. The Great Captain determined, therefore, to reserve a small corps for their reduction, while he sent forward the main body of his army to besiege Gaeta: but the Spanish infantry refused to march until the heavy arrears suffered to accumulate through the negligence of the government were discharged; and Gonsalvo, afraid of awakening the mutinous spirit which he had once found so difficult to quell, was obliged to content himself with sending forward his cavalry and German levies, and to permit the infantry to take up its quarters in the capital, under strict orders to respect the persons and property of the citizens.

He now lost no time in pressing the siege of the French fortresses, whose impregnable situation might have derided the efforts of the most formidable enemy in the ancient state of military science: but the reduction of these places was intrusted to Pedro Navarro, the celebrated engineer, whose improvements in the art of mining have gained him the popular reputation of being its inventor, and who displayed such unprecedented skill on this occasion, as makes it a memorable epoch in the annals of war.*

* Guicciardini, Istoria, tom. i. p. 304.—Giannone, Ist. di Napoli, lib. xxix. cap. iv.—Ferras, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. viii. p. 250.—Summonte, Histor. di

Napoli, tom. iii. pp. 552, 553.—Muratori, Annali, tom. xiv. p. 40.—Chronica del Gran Capitano, cap. lxxxi.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 18.

Under his directions, the small tower of St. Vicente having been first carried by a furious cannonade, a mine was run under the outer defences of the great fortress called Castel Nuovo. On the 21st of May, the mine was sprung; a passage was opened over the prostrate ramparts, and the assailants, rushing in with Gonsalvo and Navarro at their head, before the garrison had time to secure the draw, applied their ladders to the walls of the castle and succeeded in carrying the place by escalade, after a desperate struggle, in which the greater part of the French were slaughtered. An immense booty was found in the castle. The Angevin party had made it a place of deposit for their most valuable effects, gold, jewels, plate, and other treasures, which, together with its well-stored magazines of grain and ammunition, became the indiscriminate spoil of the victors. As some of these, however, complained of not getting their share of the plunder, Gonsalvo, giving full scope in

* The Italians, in their admiration of Pedro Navarro, caused medals to be struck, on which the invention of mines was ascribed to him. (Marini, ap. Daru, Hist. de Venise, tom. iii. p. 351.) Although not actually the inventor, his glory was scarcely less, since he was the first who discovered the extensive and formidable uses to which they might be applied in the science of destruction. See vol. ii. p. 110, note of this History.

the exultation of the moment to military license, called out gaily, "Make amends for it then by what you can find in my quarters!" The words were not uttered to deaf ears. The mob of soldiery rushed to the splendid palace of the Angevin Prince of Salerno, then occupied by the Great Captain, and in a moment its sumptuous furniture, paintings, and other costly decorations, together with the contents of its generous cellar, were seized and appropriated without ceremony by the invaders, who thus indemnified themselves at their general's expense for the remissness of government.

After some weeks of protracted operations, the remaining fortress, Castel d'Ovo, as it was called, opened its gates to Navarro; and a French fleet, coming into the harbour, had the mortification to find itself fired on from the walls of the place it was intended to relieve. Before this event, Gonsalvo, having obtained funds from Spain for paying off his men, quitted the capital and directed his march on Gaeta. The important results of his victories were now fully disclosed. D'Aubigny, with the wreck of the forces escaped from Seminara, had surrendered. The two Abruzzi, the Capitanate, all the Basilicate, except Venosa still held by Louis d'Ars, and indeed every considerable place in the kingdom, had tendered its submission, with the exception of Gaeta. Summoning therefore to his aid Andrada, Navarro, and his other officers, the Great Captain resolved to concentrate all his strength on this point, designing to press the siege, and thus exterminate at a blow the feeble remains of the French power in Italy. The enterprise was attended with more difficulty than he had anticipated.*

* Zurita, Hist. de Hernando, tom. i. lib. v. cap. xxx. xxxi. xxxiv. xxxv.—P. Jovii Vitæ Ill. Vm. fol. 255—257.—Garibay, Compend. Hist. tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xv. — Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. clxxxiii.—Guicciardini, Istor. d'Ital. lib. vi. pp. 307—309.

—Ulloa, Carlo V. fol. 18, 19.—Ammirato, Istorie Fiorent. tom. iii. p. 271. — Summonte, Hist. di Napoli, tom. iii. p. 554. — Chronica del Gr. Capitan, cap. lxxxiv. lxxxvi. lxxxvii. xciii. xcv.—Sismondi, Hist. des Français, tom. xv. pp. 407—409.

CHAPTER XIII.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRANCE. — UNSUCCESSFUL INVASION OF SPAIN. — TRUCE.

1503.

THE events noticed in the preceding chapter glided away as rapidly as the flitting phantoms of a dream. Scarcely had Louis XII. received the unwelcome intelligence of Gonsalvo de Cordova's refusal to obey the mandate of the Archduke Philip, ere he was astounded with the tidings of the victory of Cerignola, the march on Naples, and the surrender of that capital as well as of the greater part of the kingdom, following one another in breathless succession. It seemed as if the very means, on which the French king had so confidently relied for calming the tempest, had been the signal for awakening all its fury, and bringing it on his devoted head. Mortified and incensed at being made the dupe of what he deemed a perfidious policy, he demanded an explanation of the archduke, who was still in France. The latter, vehemently protesting his own innocence, felt, or affected to feel, so sensibly the ridiculous, and, as it appeared, dishonourable part played by him in the transaction, that he was thrown into a severe illness, which confined him to his bed for several days.* Without delay, he wrote to the Spanish court in terms of bitter expostulation, urging the immediate ratification of the treaty made pursuant to its orders, and an indemnification to France for its subsequent violation. Such is the account given by the French historians.

The Spanish writers, on the other hand, say that before the news of Gonsalvo's successes reached Spain, King Ferdinand refused to confirm the treaty sent him by his son-in-law, until it had undergone certain material modifications. If the Spanish monarch hesitated to approve the treaty in the doubtful posture of his affairs, he was little likely to do so when he had the game entirely in his own hands.†

He postponed an answer to Philip's application for some time, willing probably to gain time for the Great Captain to strengthen himself firmly in his recent acquisitions. At length, after a considerable interval, he despatched an embassy to France, announcing his final determination never to ratify a treaty made in contempt of his orders, and so clearly detrimental to his interests. He endeavoured, however, to gain further time by spinning out the negotiation, holding up for this purpose the prospect of an ultimate accommodation, and suggesting the reëstablishment of his kinsman, the unfortunate Frederic, on the Neapolitan throne, as the best means of effecting it. The artifice, however, was too gross even for the credulous Louis ; who peremptorily demanded of the ambassadors the instant and absolute ratification of the treaty, and, on their declaring it was beyond their powers, ordered them at once to leave his court. “ I had rather,” said he, “ suffer the loss of a kingdom, which may perhaps be retrieved, than the loss of honour, which never can.” A noble sentiment, but falling with no particular grace from the lips of Louis XII.*

* St. Gelais seems willing to accept Philip's statement, and consider the whole affair of the negotiation as "one of Ferdinand's old tricks," "l'ancienne cautele de celuy qui en sçavoit bien faire d'autres." Hist. de Louis XII. p. 172.

† St. Gelais, ubi supra. —

Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. p. 410. — Gaillard, Rivalité de France et d'Espagne, tom. iv. pp. 238, 239. — Zurita, Anal. de Arag. tom. v. lib. v. cap. xxii. — Garibay, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xv. — Ferreras, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. viii. p. 233.

The whole of this blind transaction is stated in so irreconcilable a manner by the historians of the different nations, that it is extremely difficult to draw any thing like a probable narrative out of them. The Spanish writers assert that the public commission of the archduke was controlled by strict private instructions ;† while the French, on the other hand,

* Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. p. 388.—Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xiii. sec. iii.—Guicciardini, Ist. d' Ital. tom. i. p. 300 ; ed. 1645. — Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. v. cap. ix.

It is amusing to see with what industry certain French writers, as Gaillard and Varillas, are perpetually contrasting the bonne foi of Louis XII. with the me- chanceté of Ferdinand, whose secret intentions, even, are quoted in evidence of his hypocrisy, while the most objectionable acts of his rival seem to be abundantly compensated by some fine sentiment like that in the text.

† Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. v. cap. x.—Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xiii. sec. ii. — Mariana, Hist. de Esp. tom. ii. pp. 690, 691.—et al.

are either silent as to the latter, or represent them to have been as broad and unlimited as his credentials.* If this be true, the negotiations must be admitted to exhibit on the part of Ferdinand as gross an example of political jugglery and falsehood as ever disgraced the annals of diplomacy.†

But it is altogether improbable, as I have before remarked, that a monarch so astute and habitually cautious should have intrusted unlimited authority, in so delicate a business, to a person whose discretion, independent of his known partiality for the French monarch, he held so lightly. It is much more likely that he limited, as is often done, the full powers committed to him in public, by private instructions of the most explicit character; and that the archduke was betrayed by his own vanity, and perhaps ambition, (for the treaty threw the immediate power into his own hands,) into arrangements unwarranted by the tenor of these instructions.*

* Claude Seyssel, Hist. de Louis XII. p. 61. — St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. p. 171. — Gaillard, Rival. de Fr. et d'Espagne, tom. iv. p. 239. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. p. 387. — J. d'Auton, Hist. de Louis XII. P. ii. ch. xxxii.

† Varillas regards Philip's mission to France as a coup de maître on the part of Ferdinand, who thereby rid himself of a dangerous rival at home, likely to contest his succession to Castile on Isabella's death, while he employed that rival in outwitting Louis XII. by a treaty which he meant to disavow.

(Politique de Ferdinand, liv. i. pp. 146 — 150.) The first of these imputations is sufficiently disproved by the fact that Philip quitted Spain in opposition to the pressing remonstrances of the king, queen, and cortes, and to the general disgust of the whole nation, as repeatedly stated by Gomez, Martyr, and other contemporaries. The second will be difficult to refute, and still harder to prove, as it rests on a man's secret intentions, known only to himself. Such are the flimsy cobwebs of which this political dreamer's theories are made. Truly chateaux en Espagne!

If this were the case, the propriety of Ferdinand's conduct in refusing the ratification, depends on the question how far a sovereign is bound by the acts of a plenipotentiary who departs from his private instructions. Formerly, the question would seem to have been unsettled. Indeed, some of the most respectable writers on public law in the beginning of the seventeenth century maintain, that such a departure would not justify the prince in withholding his ratification; deciding thus, no doubt, on principles of natural equity, which appear to require that a principal should be held responsible for the acts of an agent, coming within the scope of his powers, though at variance with his secret orders, with which the other contracting party can have no acquaintance or concern.†

* Martyr, whose copious correspondence furnishes the most valuable commentary, unquestionably, on the proceedings of this reign, is provokingly reserved in regard to this interesting matter. He contents himself with remarking in one of his letters, that "the Spaniards derided Philip's negotiations as of no consequence, and indeed altogether preposterous, considering the attitude assumed by the nation at that very time for maintaining its claims by the sword;" and he dismisses the subject with a reflection, that seems to rest the merits of the case more on might than right. "Exitus qui judex est rerum æternus loquatur. Nostri regno potiuntur majori ex parte." (Epist. cclvii.) This reserve of Martyr might be construed unfavourably for Ferdinand, were it not for the freedom with which he usually criticises whatever appears really objectionable to him in the measures of the government.

† Grotius, De Jure Bell. et Pac. lib. ii. cap. xi. sec. xii.; lib. iii. cap. xxii. sec. iv.—Gentilis, De Jure Belli, lib. iii. cap. xiv. ap. Bynkershoek, Quæst. Jur. Pub. lib. ii. cap. vii.

The inconvenience, however, arising from adopting a principle in political negotiations, which must necessarily place the destinies of a whole nation in the hands of a single individual, rash or incompetent, it may be, without the power of interference or supervision on the part of the government, has led to a different conclusion in practice; and it is now generally admitted by European writers, not merely that the exchange of ratifications is essential to the validity of a treaty, but that a government is not bound to ratify the doings of a minister who has transcended his private instructions.*

But whatever be thought of Ferdinand's good faith in the early stages of this business, there is no doubt that, at a later period, when his position was changed by the success of his arms in Italy, he sought only to amuse the French court with a show of negotiation, in order, as we have already intimated, to paralyze its operations and gain time for securing his conquests. The French writers inveigh loudly against this crafty and treacherous policy; and Louis XII. gave vent to his own indignation in no very measured terms. But, however we may now regard it, it was in perfect accordance with the trickish spirit of the age; and the French king re-

* Bynkershoek, Quæst. Juris Pub. lib. ii. cap. vii. — Mably, Droit Publique, chap. i. — Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. ii. ch. xii. — Martens, Law of Nations, trans. book ii. chap. i.

Bynkershoek, the earliest of these writers, has discussed the question with an amplitude, perspicuity, and fairness unsurpassed by any who have followed him.

signed all right of rebuking his antagonist on this score, when he condescended to become a party with him to the infamous partition treaty, and still more when he so grossly violated it. He had voluntarily engaged with his Spanish rival in the game, and it afforded no good ground of complaint that he was the least adroit of the two.

While Ferdinand was thus triumphant in his schemes of foreign policy and conquest, his domestic life was clouded with the deepest anxiety, in consequence of the declining health of the queen, and the eccentric conduct of his daughter, the Infanta Joanna. We have already witnessed the extravagant fondness with which that princess, notwithstanding her occasional sallies of jealousy, doted on her young and handsome husband.* From the hour of his departure she had been plunged in the deepest dejection, sitting day and night with her eyes fixed on the ground, in uninterrupted silence, or broken only by occasional expressions of petulant discontent. She refused all consolation, thinking only of rejoining her absent lord, "equally regardless," says Martyr, who was then at the court, "of herself, her future subjects, or her afflicted parents."†

On the 10th of March 1503, she was delivered of her second son, who received the baptismal name of

* Philip is known in history by the title of the Handsome, implying that he was, at least, quite as remarkable for his personal qualities as his mental.

† Opus Epistolar. ep. ccliii. — Ferreras, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. viii. pp. 235. 238. — Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximen. fol. 44.

Ferdinaad, in compliment to his grandfather.* No change, however, took place in the mind of the unfortunate mother, who from this time was wholly occupied with the project of returning to Flanders. An invitation to that effect, which she received from her husband in the month of November, determined her to undertake the journey at all hazards, notwithstanding the affectionate remonstrances of the queen, who represented the impracticability of traversing France, agitated, as it then was, with all the bustle of warlike preparation, or of venturing by sea at this inclement and stormy season.

One evening, while her mother was absent at Segovia, Joanna, whose residence was at Medina del Campo, left her apartment in the castle, and sallied out, though in dishabille, without announcing her purpose to any of her attendants. They followed, however, and used every argument and entreaty to prevail on her to return, at least for the night, but without effect; until the Bishop of Burgos, who had charge of her household, finding every other means ineffectual, was compelled to close the castle gates in order to prevent her departure.

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1503. — Gomecius, De Rebus Gestis Ximenii, fol. 45, 46.

He was born at Alcala de Henares. Ximenes availed himself of this circumstance to obtain from Isabella a permanent exemption from taxes for his favourite city, which his princely patronage was fast raising up to contest the palm of literary precedence with Salamanca, the ancient 'Athens of Spain.' The citizens of the place long preserved, and still preserve, for aught I know, the cradle of the royal infant, in token of their gratitude. Robles, Vida de Ximenes, p. 127.

The princess, thus thwarted in her purpose, gave way to the most violent indignation. She menaced the attendants with her utmost vengeance for their disobedience, and, taking her station on the barrier she obstinately refused to reënter the castle, or even to put on any additional covering, but remained cold and shivering on the spot till the following morning. The good bishop, sorely embarrassed by the dilemma to which he found himself reduced, of offending the queen by complying with the mad humour of the princess, or the latter still more by resisting it, despatched an express in all haste to Isabella, acquainting her with the affair, and begging instructions how to proceed.

The queen, who was staying, as has been said, at Segovia, about forty miles distant, alarmed at the intelligence, sent the king's cousin, the Admiral Henriquez, together with the Archbishop of Toledo at once to Medina, and prepared to follow as far as the feeble state of her health would permit. The efforts of these eminent persons, however, were no much more successful than those of the bishop. All they could obtain from Joanna was, that she would retire to a miserable kitchen in the neighbourhood during the night; while she persisted in taking her station on the barrier as soon as it was light, and continued there, immovable as a statue, the whole day. In this deplorable state she was found by the queen on her arrival; and it was not without great difficulty that the latter, with all the deference habitually paid her by her daughter, succeeded in persuading her to return to her own apartments in the castle. These were the first unequivocal symptoms of that hereditary taint of insanity which had clouded the latter days of Isabella's mother, and which, with a few brief intervals, was to shed a deeper gloom over the long protracted existence of her unfortunate daughter.*

The conviction of this sad infirmity of the princess gave a shock to the unhappy mother, scarcely less than that which she had formerly been called on to endure in the death of her children. The sorrows over which time had had so little power, were opened afresh by a calamity which naturally filled her with the most gloomy forebodings for the fate of her people, whose welfare was to be committed to such incompetent hands. These domestic griefs were still further swelled at this time by the death of two of her ancient friends and counsellors, Juan Chacon, Adelantado of Murcia,† and Gutierre de Cardenas, Grand Commander of Leon.‡ They had

* Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxviii. — Zurita, Hist. de Hern. tom. i. lib. v. cap. lvi. — Alvar. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximenii, fol. 46.

† “Espejo de bondad,”—mirror of virtue,—as Oviedo styles this cavalier. He was always much regarded by the sovereigns; and the lucrative post of contador mayor, which he filled for many years, enabled him to acquire an immense estate, 50,000 ducats a year, without imputation on his honesty. Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 2, dial. 2.

‡ The name of this cavalier, as well as that of his cousin, Alonso de Cardenas, Grand Master of St. James, have become familiar to us in the Granadine war. If Don Gutierre made a less brilliant figure than the latter, he acquired, by means of his intimacy with the sovereigns, and his personal qualities, as attached themselves to Isabella in the early part of her life, when her fortunes were still under a cloud, and they afterwards reaped the requital of the vices in such ample honours and emoluments as gratitude could bestow, and in the full enjoyment of her confidence, to which their steady devotion and interests well entitled them. *

But neither the domestic troubles which pressed heavily on Isabella's heart, nor the rapidly declining state of her own health, had power to blunt the vigour of her mind, or lessen the vigilance with which she watched over the interests of her people. A remarkable proof of this was given in the autumn of the present year, 1503, when the country was menaced with an invasion from France.

The whole French nation had shared the indignity of Louis XII. at the mortifying result of his enterprise against Naples; and it answered his calls for supplies so promptly and liberally that, in great weight in the royal councils as any subject in the kingdom. "Nothing of any importance," says Oviedo. "was done without his advice." He was raised to the important posts of Comendador de Leon, and contador mayor; which last, in the words of the same author, "made its possessor a second king over the public treasury." He left large estates, and more than five thousand vassals. His eldest son and heir was created Duke of Maqueda. Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 2, dial. 1.

* Martyr, Op. Epist. —Alv. Gomecius, fol. 4. For some further account of the individuals, see vol. ii. p. 1. of this History.

Martyr thus panegyricizes the queen's fortitude under cumulated sorrows. "Sciet constantissima sit, fœminam prudens, hæc fortunæ sævientis regis concussa fluctibus undique luti vasta rupes, maris indomito." Opus Epistolarum cit.

months after the defeat of Cerignola, he was able to resume operations on a more formidable scale than France had witnessed for centuries. Three large armies were raised, one to retrieve affairs in Italy, a second to penetrate into Spain by the way of Fontarabia, and a third to cross into Roussillon, and get possession of the strong post of Salsas, the key of the mountain passes in that quarter. Two fleets were also equipped in the ports of Genoa and Marseilles, the last of which was to support the invasion of Roussillon by a descent on the coast of Catalonia. These various corps were intended to act in concert, and thus, by one grand simultaneous movement, Spain was to be assailed on three several points of her territory. The results did not correspond with the magnificence of the apparatus.*

The army destined to march on Fontarabia was placed under the command of Alan d'Albret, father of the King of Navarre, along the frontiers of whose dominions its route necessarily lay. Ferdinand had assured himself of the favourable dispositions of this prince, the situation of whose kingdom, more than its strength, made his friendship important; and the Lord d'Albret, whether from a direct understanding with the Spanish monarch, or fearful of the consequences which might result to his son from the hostility of the latter, detained the forces intrusted to him so long among the bleak and barren fastnesses of the mountains, that at length, exhausted by fatigue and want of food, the army melted away without even reaching the enemy's borders.*

* Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 405, 406. — Ferreras, Hist. d'Esp. tom. viii. pp. 235—238.—Guicciardini, Isto-

ria, tom. i. pp. 300, 301.—Mém. de Tremouille, ch. xix. ap. Mémoires Françaises, tom. xiv.

The force directed against Roussillon was of a more formidable character. It was commanded by the Maréchal de Rieux, a brave and experienced officer, though much broken by age and bodily infirmities. It amounted to more than twenty thousand men. Its strength, however, lay chiefly in its numbers. It was, with the exception of a few thousand lansquenets under William de la Marck,† made up of the arrière-ban of the kingdom, and the undisciplined militia from the great towns of Languedoc. With this numerous array the French marshal entered Roussillon without opposition, and sat down before Salsas on the 16th of September 1503.

The old castle of Salsas, which had been carried without much difficulty by the French in the preceding war, had been put in a defensible condition under the superintendence of Pedro Navarro, at the

* Aleson, Hist. de Navarra, tom. v. pp. 110—112.

The King of Navarre promised to oppose the passage of the French, if attempted, through his dominions, and, in order to obviate any distrust on the part of Ferdinand, sent his daughter Margaret to reside at the court of Castile as a pledge for his fidelity. Ferreras, Hist. d'Espag. tom. viii. p. 235.

† Younger brother of Robert,

third Duke of Bouillon. (J. d'Auton, P. ii. pp. 103. 186.) The reader will not confound him with his namesake, the famous 'Boar of Ardenne,'—more familiar to us now in the pages of romance than history,—who perished ignominiously some twenty years before this period, in 1484, not in fight, but by the hands of the common executioner at Utrecht. Duclos, Hist. de Louis XI. tom. ii. p. 379.

commencement of the present, although the repairs were not yet wholly completed. Ferdinand, on the approach of the enemy, had thrown a thousand picked men into the place, which was well victualled and provided for a siege; while a corps of 6000 was placed under his cousin, Don Frederic de Toledo, Duke of Alba, with orders to take up a position in the neighbourhood, where he might watch the movements of the enemy, and annoy him as far as possible by cutting off his supplies.*

Ferdinand, in the mean while, lost no time in enforcing levies throughout the kingdom, with which he might advance to the relief of the beleaguered fortress. While thus occupied, he received such accounts of the queen's indisposition as induced him to quit Aragon, where he then was, and hasten by rapid journeys to Castile. The accounts were probably exaggerated; he found no cause for immediate alarm on his arrival, and Isabella, ever ready to sacrifice her own inclinations to the public weal, persuaded him to return to the scene of operations, where his presence at this juncture was so important. Forgetting her illness, she made the most unwearied efforts for assembling troops without delay to support her husband. The Grand Constable of Castile was commissioned to raise levies through every part of the kingdom; and the prin-

* Cartas de Gonzalo Ayora, c. ix. — Aleson, Hist. de Nav. tom. v. pp. 112, 113. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. p. 407.

—Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. v. c. li. — Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xiii. sec. xi.

cial nobility flocked in with their retainers from the farthest provinces, all eager to obey the orders of their beloved mistress. Thus strengthened Ferdinand, whose head-quarters were established at Girona, saw himself in less than a month in possession of a force which, including the supplies of Aragon, amounted to ten or twelve thousand horse and three or four times that number of foot. He no longer delayed his march, and about the middle of October put his army in motion, proposing to make a junction with the Duke of Alva, then lying at Perpignan, at a few leagues' distance from Salsas.

Isabella, who was at Segovia, was made acquainted by regular expresses with every movement of the army. She no sooner learned its departure from Girona, than she was filled with disgust at the prospect of a speedy encounter with the enemy, whose defeat, whatever glory it might reflect on her own arms, could be purchased at the expense of Christian blood. She wrote on the most earnest terms to her husband, requesting him to drive his enemies to despair by closing up

* Ayora, Cartas, cap. ix. — Zurita, ubi supra. — Bernaldez, Hist. de los Reyes Catol. MS. cap. cxcvii. cxcviii. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1503. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. viii.

The most authentic account of the siege of Salsas is to be found in the correspondence of Gonzalo Ayora, dated from the Spanish camp. This indifferently brave and equally eminent in letters and arms, filled the dissimulated rôle of captain of the royal guard, and was historiographer of the crown. He served in the army at the siege of Perpignan, and was present at all its operations. Pref. ad Cartas de D. Juan de Sandoval, and Nic. Antonio, Bibl. hisp. tom. i. p. 551.

retreat to their own land, but to leave vengeance to Him to whom alone it belonged. She passed her days, together with her whole household, in fasting and continual prayer, and, in the fervour of her pious zeal, personally visited the several religious houses of the city, distributing alms among their holy inmates, and imploring them humbly to supplicate the Almighty to avert the impending calamity.*

The prayers of the devout queen and her court found favour with Heaven.† King Ferdinand reached Perpignan on the 19th of October, and on that same night the French marshal, finding himself unequal to the rencontre with the combined forces of Spain, broke up his camp, and, setting fire to his tents, began his retreat towards the frontier, having consumed nearly six weeks since first opening trenches. Ferdinand pressed close on his flying enemy, whose rear sustained some annoyance from the Spanish ginetes in its passage through the defiles of the sierras. The

* Martyr, Opus Epistolar. ep. cclxiii.

The loyal Captain Ayora shows little of this Christian vein. He concludes one of his letters with praying, no doubt most sincerely, "that the Almighty would be pleased to infuse less benevolence into the hearts of the sovereigns, and incite them to chastise and humble the proud French, and strip them of their ill-gotten possessions, which, however repugnant to their own godly inclinations, would tend greatly to replenish their coffers, as well as those of their faithful and loving subjects." See this graceless petition in Cartas, No. ix. p. 66.

† "Exaudivit igitur sanctæ reginæ religiosorumque ac virginum preces summus Altitons." (Ep. cclxiii.) The learned Theban borrows an epithet more familiar to Greek and Roman than Christian ears.

retreat, however, was conducted in too good order to allow any material loss to be inflicted on the French, who succeeded at length in sheltering themselves under the cannon of Narbonne, up to which place they were pursued by their victorious foe. Several places on the frontier, as Leocate, Palme, Sigeon, Roquefort, and others, were abandoned to the Spaniards, who pillaged them of whatever was worth carrying off; without any violence, however, to the persons of the inhabitants, whom, as a Christian population, if we are to believe Martyr, Ferdinand refused even to make prisoners.*

The Spanish monarch made no attempt to retain these acquisitions; but, having dismantled some of the towns which offered most resistance, returned loaded with the spoils of victory to his own dominions. "Had he been as good a general as he was

* Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. v. cap. liv. — Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xiii. sec. xi. — Martyr, epist. cclxiv. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1503. — Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. cxcviii. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 408, 409. — Ayora, carta xi. — Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. dial. de Deza.

Peter Martyr seems to have shared none of Isabella's scruples in regard to bringing the enemy to battle. On the contrary, he indulges in a most querulous strain of sarcasm against the Catholic king for his remissness in this particular. "Quare elucescente die moniti nostri de Gallorum discessu, ad eos, at sero, concurrerunt. Rex Perpiniani agebat, ad millia passuum sex non brevia, uti nosti. Propterea sero id actum, venit concitato cursu, at sero. Ad hostes itur, at sero. Cernunt hostium acies, at sero, et à longè. Distabant jam milliaria circiter duo. Ergo sero Phryges sapuerunt. Cujus hæc culpa, tu scrutator aliunde; mea est, si nescis. Maximam dedit ea dies, quæ est, si nescis, calendarum Novembrium sexta, Hispanis ignominiam, et aliquando jacturam illis pariet collachrymandam." Letter to the Cardinal of Santa Cruz, No. cclxii.

a statesman," says a Spanish historian, "he might have penetrated to the centre of France."* Ferdinand, however, was too prudent to attempt conquests which could only be maintained, if maintained at all, at an infinite expense of blood and treasure. He had sufficiently vindicated his honour by meeting his foe so promptly, and driving him triumphantly over the border; and he preferred, like a cautious prince, not to risk all he had gained by attempting more, but to employ his present successes as a vantage-ground for entering on negotiation, in which at times he placed more reliance than the sword.

In this, his good star still further favoured him. The armada, equipped at so much cost by the French king at Marseilles, had no sooner put to sea than it was assailed by furious tempests, and so far crippled that it was obliged to return to port without even effecting a descent on the Spanish coast.

These accumulated disasters so disheartened Louis XII, that he consented to enter into negotiations for a suspension of hostilities, and an armistice was finally arranged, through the mediation of his pensioner Frederic, ex-king of Naples, between the hostile monarchs. It extended only to their heredi-

* Aleson, Hist. de Navarra, tom. v. p. 113.

Oviedo, who was present in this campaign, seems to have been of the same opinion. At least he says, "If the king had pursued vigorously, not a Frenchman would have lived to carry back the tidings of defeat to his own land." If we are to believe him, Ferdinand desisted from the pursuit at the earnest entreaty of Bishop Deza, his confessor. Quincuagenas, MS.

tary dominions; Italy and the circumjacent seas being still left open as a common arena, on which the rival parties might meet, and settle their respective titles by the sword. The truce, first concluded for five months, was subsequently prolonged to three years. It gave Ferdinand, what he most needed, leisure and means to provide for the security of his Italian possessions, on which the dark storm of war was soon to burst with tenfold fury.*

The unfortunate Frederic, who had been drawn from his obscurity to take part in these negotiations, died in the following year. It is singular that the last act of his political life should have been to mediate a peace between the dominions of two monarchs who had united to strip him of his own.

The results of this campaign were as honourable to Spain as they were disastrous and humiliating to Louis XII, who had seen his arms baffled on every point, and all his mighty apparatus of fleets and armies dissolve, as if by enchantment, in less time than it had been preparing. The immediate success of Spain may no doubt be ascribed, in a

* Zurita, Anal. de Arag. tom. v. lib. v. cap. lv.—Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xiii. sec. xi. — Martyr, Opus Epistol. ep. cclxiv. — Lanuza, Anales Eccles. y Seglar. tom. i. cap. xvii. — Garibay, Hist. de Esp. tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xvi. — Machiavelli, Legazione Prima a Roma, let. xxvii.

Mons. Varillas notices as the weak side of Louis XII, “une demangeaison de faire la paix à contre-temps, dont il fut travaillé durant toute sa vie.” (Polit. de Ferd. liv. i. p. 148.) A statesman shrewder than Varillas, De Retz, furnishes perhaps the best key to this policy, in the remark, “Les gens foibles ne plient jamais quand ils le doivent.”

considerable degree, to the improved organisation and thorough discipline introduced by the sovereigns into the national militia at the close of the Moorish war, without which it would have been scarcely possible to concentrate so promptly on a distant point such large masses of men, all well equipped and trained for active service. So soon was the nation called to feel the effect of these wise provisions.

But the results of the campaign are, after all, less worthy of notice as indicating the resources of the country, than as evidence of a pervading patriotic feeling, which could alone make these resources available. Instead of the narrow local jealousies which had so long estranged the people of the separate provinces, and more especially those of the rival states of Aragon and Castile, from one another, there had been gradually raised up a common national sentiment, like that knitting together the constituent parts of one great commonwealth. At the first alarm of invasion on the frontier of Aragon, the whole extent of the sister kingdom, from the green valleys of the Guadalquivir up to the rocky fastnesses of the Asturias, responded to the call as to that of a common country, sending forth, as we have seen, its swarms of warriors to repel the foe, and roll back the tide of war upon his own land. What a contrast did all this present to the cold and parsimonious hand with which the nation, thirty years before, dealt out its supplies to King John II, Ferdinand's father, when he was left to cope single-handed with the whole power of France, in this very quarter of Rousillon! Such was the consequence of the glorious union, which brought together the petty and hitherto discordant tribes of the Peninsula under the same rule, and by creating common interests, and a harmonious principle of action, was silently preparing them for constituting one great nation,—one and indivisible, as intended by nature.

Those who have not themselves had occasion to pursue historical inquiries will scarcely imagine on what loose grounds the greater part of the narrative is to be built. With the exception of a few leading outlines, there is such a mass of inconsistency and contradiction in the details, even of contemporaries, that it seems almost as hopeless to seize the true aspect of any particular age, as it would be to transfer to the canvass a faithful likeness of an individual from a description simply of his prominent features.

Much of the difficulty might seem to be removed, now that we are on the luminous and beaten track of Italian history; but, in fact, the vision is rather dazzled than assisted by the numerous crosslights thrown over the path, and the infinitely various points of view from which every object is contemplated. Besides the local and party prejudices which we had to encounter in the contemporary Spanish historians, we have now a host of national prejudices not less unfavourable to truth; while the remoteness of the scene of action necessarily begets a thousand additional inaccuracies in the gossiping and credulous chroniclers of France and Spain.

The mode in which public negotiations were conducted at this period, interposes still further embarrassments in our search after truth. They were regarded as the personal concerns of the sovereign, in which the nation at large had no right to interfere. They were settled, like the rest of his private affairs, under his own eye, without the participation of any other branch of the government.

They were shrouded, therefore, under an impenetrable secrecy, which permitted such results only to emerge into light as suited the monarch. Even these results cannot be relied on as furnishing the true key to the intentions of the parties. The science of the cabinet, as then practised, authorised such a system of artifice and shameless duplicity, as greatly impaired the credit of those official documents which we are accustomed to regard as the surest foundations of history.

The only records which we can receive with full confidence are the private correspondence of contemporaries, which, from its very nature, is exempt from most of the restraint and affectations incident more or less to every work destined for the public eye. Such communications, indeed, come like the voice of departed years; and when, as in Martyr's case, they proceed from one whose acuteness is combined with singular opportunities for observation, they are of inestimable value. Instead of exposing to us only the results, they lay open the interior workings of the machinery, and we enter into all the shifting doubts, passions, and purposes, which agitate the minds of the actors. Unfortunately, the chain of correspondence here, as in similar cases, when not originally designed for historical uses, necessarily suffers from occasional breaks and interruptions. The scattered gleams which are thrown over the most prominent points, however, shed so strong a light, as materially to aid us in groping our way through the darker and more perplexed passages of the story.

The obscurity which hangs over the period has not been dispelled by those modern writers, who, like Varillas, in his well known work, Politique de Ferdinand le Catholique, affect to treat the subject philosophically, paying less attention to facts than to their causes and consequences. These ingenious persons, seldom willing to take things as they find them, seem to think that truth is only to be reached by delving deep below the surface. In this search after more profound causes of action, they reject whatever is natural and obvious. They are inexhaustible in conjectures and fine-spun conclusions, inferring quite as much from what is not said or done, as from what is. In short, they put the reader as completely in possession of their hero's thoughts on all occasions, as any professed romance writer would venture to do. All this may be very agreeable, and to persons of easy faith very satisfactory ;

but it is not history, and may well remind us of the astonishment somewhere expressed by Cardinal de Retz at the assurance of those who, at a distance from the scene of action, professed to lay open all the secret springs of policy of which he himself, though a principal party, was ignorant.

No prince, on the whole, has suffered more from these unwarrantable liberties than Ferdinand the Catholic. His reputation for shrewd policy suggests a ready key to whatever is mysterious and otherwise inexplicable in his government; while it puts writers like Gaillard and Varillas constantly on the scent after the most secret and subtle sources of action, as if there were always something more to be detected than readily meets the eye. Instead of judging him by the general rules of human conduct, everything is referred to deep-laid stratagem; no allowance is made for the ordinary disturbing forces, the passions and casualties of life; every action proceeds with the same wary calculation that regulates the moves upon a chessboard; and thus a character of consummate artifice is built up, not only unsupported by historical evidence, but in manifest contradiction to the principles of our nature. The part of our subject embraced in the present chapter has long been debateable ground between the French and Spanish historians; and the obscurity which hangs over it has furnished an ample range for speculation to the class of writers above alluded to, which they have not failed to improve.

CHAPTER XIV.

ITALIAN WARS.—CONDITION OF ITALY.—FRENCH AND SPANISH ARMIES ON THE GARIGLIANO.

1503.

WE must now turn our eyes towards Italy, where the sounds of war, which had lately died away, were again heard in wilder dissonance than ever. Our attention, hitherto, has been too exclusively directed to mere military manœuvres to allow us to dwell much on the condition of this unhappy land. The dreary progress of our story over fields of blood and battle might naturally dispose the imagination to lay the scene of action in some rude and savage age ; an age, at best, of feudal heroism, when the energies of the soul could be roused only by the fierce din of war.

Far otherwise, however ; the tents of the hostile armies were now pitched in the bosom of the most lovely and cultivated regions on the globe ; inhabited by a people who had carried the various arts of policy and social life to a degree of perfection elsewhere unknown ; whose natural resources had been augmented by all the appliances of ingenuity and industry ; whose cities were crowded with magnificent and costly works of public utility ; into whose ports every wind that blew wafted the rich freights of distant climes ; whose thousand hills were covered to their very tops with the golden labours of the husbandman ; and whose intellectual development showed itself, not only in a liberal scholarship far outstripping that of their contemporaries, but in works of imagination, and of elegant art more particularly, which rivalled the best days of antiquity. The period before us, indeed, the commencement of the fifteenth century, was that of their meridian splendour, when Italian genius, breaking through the cloud which had temporarily obscured its early dawn, shone out in full effulgence ; for we are now touching on the age of Machiavelli, Ariosto, and Michel Angelo,—the golden age of Leo X.

It is impossible, even at this distance of time, to contemplate without feelings of sadness the fate of such a country, thus suddenly converted into an arena for the bloody exhibitions of the gladiators of Europe ; to behold her trodden under foot by the very nations on whom she had freely poured the light of civilization ; to see the fierce soldiery of Europe, from the Danube to the Tagus, sweeping like an army of locusts over her fields, defiling her pleasant places, and raising the shout of battle or of brutal triumph under the shadow of those monuments of genius, which have been the delight and despair of succeeding ages. It was the old story of the Goths and Vandals acted over again. Those more refined arts of the cabinet, on which the Italians were accustomed to rely, much more than on the sword, in their disputes with one another, were of no avail against these rude invaders, whose strong arm easily broke through the subtle webs of policy which entangled the movements of less formidable adversaries. It was the triumph of brute force over civilization,—one of the most humiliating lessons by which Providence has seen fit to rebuke the pride of human intellect.*

The fate of Italy inculcates a most important lesson. With all this outward show of prosperity, her political institutions had gradually lost the vital principle which could alone give them stability or real value. The forms of freedom, indeed, in most

* “ O pria sì cara al ciel del mondo parte,
 Che l'acqua cigne, e 'l sasso orrido serra ;
 O lieta sopra ogn' altra e dolce terra,
 Che 'l superbo Appennin segna e diparte :
 Che val omai, se 'l buon popol di Marte
 Ti lasciò del mar donna e de la terra ?
 Le genti a te già serve, or ti fan guerra,
 E pongon man ne le tue treccie sparte.
 Lasso nè manca de' tuoi figli ancora,
 Chi le più strane a te chiamando insieme
 La spada sua nel tuo bel corpo adopre.
 Or son queste simili a l' antich' opre ?
 O pur così pietate e Dio s' onora ?
 Ahi secol duro, ahi tralignato seme.”

Bembo, Opere, tom. ii. p. 86.

This exquisite little lyric, inferior to none other which had appeared on the same subject since the “ Italia mia,” of Petrarch, was composed by Bembo at the period of which we are treating.

instances, had sunk under the usurpation of some aspiring chief. Everywhere patriotism was lost in the most intense selfishness. Moral principle was at as low an ebb in private as in public life. The hands which shed their liberal patronage over genius and learning were too often red with blood. The courtly precincts, which seemed the favourite haunt of the Muses, were too often the Epicurean sty of brutish sensuality; while the head of the church itself, whose station, exalted over that of every worldly potentate, should have raised him at least above their grosser vices, was sunk in the foulest corruptions that debase poor human nature. Was it surprising then that the tree, thus cankered at heart, with all the goodly show of blossoms on its branches, should have fallen before the blast which now descended in such pitiless fury from the mountains?

Had there been an invigorating national feeling, any common principle of coalition between the Italian states; had they, in short, been true to themselves; they possessed abundant resources in their wealth, talent, and superior science, to have shielded their soil from violation. Unfortunately, while the other European states had been augmenting their strength incalculably by the consolidation of their scattered fragments into one whole, those of Italy, in the absence of some great central point round which to rally, had grown more and more confirmed in their original disunion. Thus, without concert in action, and destitute of the vivifying impulse of patriotic sentiment, they were delivered up to be the spoil and mockery of nations whom in their proud language they still despised as barbarians; an impressive example of the impotence of human genius, and of the instability of human institutions, however excellent in themselves, when unsustained by public and private virtue.*

The great powers, who had now entered the lists, created entirely new interests in Italy, which broke up the old political combinations. The conquest of Milan enabled France to assume a decided control over the affairs of the country. Her recent reverses in Naples, however, had greatly loosened this authority; although Florence and other neighbouring states, which lay under her colossal shadow, still remained true to her. Venice, with her usual crafty policy, kept aloof, maintaining a position of neutrality between the belligerents, each of whom made the most pressing efforts to secure so formidable an ally. She, had, however, long since entertained a deep distrust of her French neighbour; and although she would enter into no public engagements, she gave the Spanish minister every assurance of her friendly disposition towards his government.† She

* The philosophic Machiavelli discerned the true causes of the calamities in the corruptions of his country, which he has exposed, with more than his usual boldness and bitterness of sarcasm, in the seventh book of his Arte della Guerra.

† Lorenzo Suarez de la Vega

filled the post of minister at the republic during the whole of the war. His long continuance in the office at so critical a period, under so vigilant a sovereign as Ferdinand, is sufficient warrant for his ability. Peter Martyr, while he admits his talents, made some objections to his apintimated this still more unequivocally by the supplies she allowed her citizens to carry into Barleta during the late campaign, and by other indirect aid of a similar nature during the present ; for all which she was one day to be called to a heavy reckoning by her enemies.

The disposition of the papal court towards the French monarch was still less favourable ; and it took no pains to conceal this after his reverses in Naples. Soon after the defeat of Cerignola, it entered into correspondence with Gonsalvo de Cordova, and although Alexander VI. refused to break openly with France, and sign a treaty with the Spanish sovereigns, he pledged himself to do so on the reduction of Gaeta. In the mean time, he freely allowed the Great Captain to raise such levies as he could in Rome, before the very eyes of the French ambassador ; so little had the immense concessions of Louis, including those of principle and honour, availed to secure the fidelity of this treacherous ally.*

pointment, on the ground of his want of scholarship. “ Nec placet quòd hunc elegeritis hac tempestate. Maluisssem namque virum, qui Latinam calleret, vel saltem intelligeret linguam ; hic tantùm suam patriam vernaculam novit ; prudentem esse aliàs, atque inter ignaros literarum, satis esse gnarum, Rex ipse mihi testatus est. Cupissem tamen ego, quæ dixi.” (See the letter to the Catholic Queen. Opus Epistolar. ep. ccxvi.) The objections have weight undoubtedly, the Latin being the common medium of diplomatic intercourse at that time. Martyr, who on his return through Venice from his Egyptian mission, took charge for the time of the interests of Spain, might probably have been prevailed on to assume the difficulties of a diplomatic station there himself. See also p. 95, note*, of this volume.

* Zurita, Hist. de Hern. tom. i. lib. v. cap. xxxviii. xlviii.—Bembo, Istor. Viniz. tom. iii. lib. vi.—Daru, Hist. de Venise, tom.

With the Emperor Maximilian, notwithstanding repeated treaties, he was on scarcely better terms. That prince was connected with Spain by the matrimonial alliances of his family, and no less averse to France from personal feeling, which with the majority of minds operates more powerfully than motives of state policy. He had, moreover, always regarded the occupation of Milan by the latter as an infringement, in some measure, of his imperial rights. The Spanish government, availing itself of these feelings, endeavoured through its minister Don Juan Manuel to stimulate Maximilian to the invasion of Lombardy. As the emperor, however, demanded, as usual, a liberal subsidy for carrying on the war, King Ferdinand, who was seldom incommoded by a superfluity of funds, preferred reserving them for his own enterprises to hazarding them on the quixotic schemes of his ally; but, although the negotiations were attended with no result, the amicable dispositions of the Austrian government were evinced by the permission given to its subjects to serve under the banners of Gonsalvo, where indeed, as we have already seen, they formed some of his best troops.*

But while Louis XII. drew so little assistance from abroad, the heartiness with which the whole French people entered into his feelings at this crisis made him nearly independent of it; and in an incre-

iii. p. 347.—Guicciardini, Istor.
tom. i. lib. vi. p. 311; ed. 1645.
—Buonaccorsi, Diar. pp. 77. 81.

* Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. v.
cap. lv.—Coxe, House of Aus- tria, vol. i. chap. xxiii. 4to.

dibly short space of time placed him in a condition for resuming operations on a far more formidable scale than before. The preceding failures in Italy he attributed in a great degree to an overweening confidence in the superiority of his own troops, and his neglect to support them with the necessary reinforcements and supplies. He now provided against this by remitting large sums to Rome, and establishing ample magazines of grain and military stores there, under the direction of commissaries, for the maintenance of the army. He equipped without loss of time a large armament at Genoa, under the Marquis of Saluzzo, for the relief of Gaeta, still blockaded by the Spaniards. He obtained a small supply of men from his Italian allies, and subsidized a corps of 8000 Swiss, the strength of his infantry; while the remainder of his army, comprehending a fine body of cavalry, and the most complete train of artillery, probably, in Europe, was drawn from his own dominions. Volunteers of the highest rank pressed forward to serve in an expedition to which they confidently looked for the vindication of the national honour. The command was intrusted to the Maréchal de la Tremouille, esteemed the best general in France; and the whole amount of force, exclusive of that employed permanently in the fleet, is variously computed at from twenty to thirty thousand men.*

* Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 78. XII. pp. 173, 174.—Varillas, —St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i. pp.

In the month of July 1503, the army was on its march across the broad plains of Lombardy; but on reaching Parma, the appointed place of rendezvous for the Swiss and Italian mercenaries, was brought to a halt by tidings of an unlooked-for event, the death of Pope Alexander VI. He expired on the 18th of August 1503, at the age of seventy-two, the victim, there is very little doubt, of poison he had prepared for others; thus closing an infamous life by a death equally infamous! He was a man of undoubted talent, and uncommon energy of character; but his powers were perverted to the worst purposes, and his gross vices were unredeemed, if we are to credit the report of his most respectable contemporaries, by a single virtue. In him the papacy reached its lowest degradation. His pontificate, however, was not without its use; since that Providence, which still educes good from evil, made the scandal, which it occasioned to the Christian world, a principal spring of the glorious Reformation.*

386, 387.—Mém. de Tremouille, ch. xix. ap. Coll. des Mém. Fr. tom. xiv. — Muratori, Annali d'Ital. tom. xiv. anno 1503.

Historians, as usual, differ widely in their estimates of the French numbers. Guicciardini, whose moderate computation of 20,000 men is usually followed, does not take the trouble to reconcile his sum total with the various estimates given by him in detail, which considerably exceed that amount. Cf. pp. 308, 309. 312.

* Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 81. — Bembo, Ist. Viniz. lib. vi.

The little ceremony with which Alexander's remains were treated while yet scarcely cold, is the best commentary on the general detestation in which he was held. "Lorsque Alexandre," says the pope's maître des ceremonies, "rendit le dernier soupir, il n'y avait dans sa cham-

The death of this pontiff occasioned no particular disquietude at the Spanish court, where his immoral life had been viewed with undisguised reprobation, and made the subject of more than one pressing remonstrance, as we have already seen. His public course had been as little to its satisfaction; since, although a Spaniard by birth, being a native of Valencia, he had placed himself almost wholly at the disposal of Louis XII, in return for the countenance afforded by that monarch to the iniquitous schemes of his son Cæsar Borgia.

The pope's death was attended with important consequences on the movements of the French. Louis's favourite minister, Cardinal d'Amboise, had long looked to this event as opening to him the succession to the tiara. He now hastened into Italy, therefore, with his master's approbation, proposing to enforce his pretensions by the presence of the French army, placed, as it would seem, with this view at his disposal.

The army, accordingly, was ordered to advance towards Rome, and halt within a few miles of its gates. The conclave of cardinals, then convened bre que l'évêque de Rieti, le daitaire et quelques palefreniers. Cette chambre fut aussitôt pillée. La face du cadavre devint noire; la langue s'enfla au point qu'elle remplissait la bouche qui resta ouverte. La bière dans laquelle il fallait mettre le corps se trouva trop petite; on l'y enfonça à coups de poings. Les restes du pape insultés par ses domestiques furent portés dans l'église de St. Pierre, sans être accompagnés de prêtres ni de torches, et on les plaça en dedans de la grille du chœur pour les dérober aux outrages de la populace." Notice de Burcard, ap. MSS. de la Bibliothèque du Roi, tom. i. p. 120.

to supply the vacancy in the pontificate, were filled with indignation at this attempt to overawe their election; and the citizens beheld with anxiety the encampment of this formidable force under their walls, anticipating some counteracting movement on the part of the Great Captain, which might involve their capital, already in a state of anarchy, in all the horrors of war. Gonsalvo, indeed, had sent forward a detachment of between two and three thousand men under Mendoza and Fabricio Colonna, who posted themselves in the neighbourhood of the city, where they could observe the movements of the enemy.*

At length Cardinal d'Amboise, yielding to public feeling, and the representations of pretended friends, consented to the removal of the French forces from the neighbourhood, and trusted for success to his personal influence. He overestimated its weight. It is foreign to our purpose to detail the proceedings of the reverend body thus convened to supply the chair of St. Peter. They are displayed at full length by the Italian writers, and must be allowed to form a most edifying chapter in ecclesiastical history.† It is enough to state that, on the departure of the French, the suffrages of the conclave fell on an Italian, who assumed the name of Pius III, September 22nd, and who justified the policy of the choice by dying in less time than his best friends had anticipated,—within a month after his elevation.*

* Buonaccorsi, p. 82. — Machiavelli, Legazione Prima a Roma, Lett. i. iii. et al. — Bembo, Ist. Viniz. tom. iii. lib. vi. — Ammirato, Istor. Fiorentina, tom. iii. lib. xxviii. — Zurita, Anal. tom. v. lib. v. cap. xlvii.

† Guicciardini, in particular, has related them with a circumstantiality which could scarcely have been exceeded by one of the conclave itself. Istoria, lib. vi. pp. 316—318.

The new vacancy was at once supplied by the election of Julius II, October 31st, the belligerent pontiff who made his tiara a helmet, and his crosier a sword. It is remarkable that, while his fierce, inexorable temper left him with scarcely a personal friend, he came to the throne by the united suffrages of each of the rival factions, of France, Spain, and, above all, Venice, whose ruin in return he made the great business of his restless pontificate.†

No sooner had the game, into which Cardinal d'Amboise had entered with such prospects of success, been snatched from his grasp by the superior address of his Italian rivals, and the election of Pius III. been publicly announced, than the French army was permitted to resume its march on Naples, after the loss,—an irreparable loss,—of more than a month. A still greater misfortune had befallen it, in the mean time, in the illness of Tremouille, its chief, which compelled him to resign the command into the hands of the Marquis of Mantua, an Italian

* Bembo, Istor. Viniz. lib. vi. — Ammirato, Istorie Fiorent. tom. iii. lib. xxviii.

The election of Pius was extremely grateful to Queen Isabella, who caused Te Deums and thanksgivings to be celebrated in the churches, for the appointment of “so worthy a pastor over the Christian fold.” See Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxv.

† Machiavelli, Legaz. Prima a Roma, Let. vi. — Bembo, Istor. Viniz. lib. vii.

nobleman, who held the second station in the army. He was a man of some military experience, having fought in the Venetian service, and led the allied forces, with doubtful credit indeed, against Charles VIII. at the battle of Fornovo. His elevation was more acceptable to his own countrymen than to the French; and in truth, however competent to ordinary exigencies, he was altogether unequal to the present, in which he was compelled to measure his genius with that of the greatest captain of the age.*

The Spanish commander, in the mean while, was detained before the strong post of Gaeta, into which Ives d'Allègre had thrown himself, as already noticed, with the fugitives from the field of Cerignola, where he had been subsequently reinforced by 4000 additional troops under the Marquis of Saluzzo. From these circumstances, as well as the great strength of the place, Gonsalvo experienced an opposition, to which of late he had been wholly unaccustomed. His exposed situation in the plains, under the guns of the city, occasioned the loss of many of his best men, and, among others, that of his friend Don Hugo de Cardona, one of the late victors at Seminara, who was shot down at his side while conversing with him. At length, after a desperate but ineffectual attempt to extricate himself from his perilous position, by forcing the neighbouring eminence of Mount Orlando, he was compelled to retire to a greater distance, and draw off his army to the adjacent village of Castellone, which may call up more agreeable associations in the reader's mind, as the site of the Villa Formiana of Cicero.* At this place he was still occupied with the blockade of Gaeta, when he received intelligence that the French had crossed the Tiber and were in full march against him.†

* Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 435—438. — Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. lib. vi. p.

316. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 83. — St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. p. 173.

While Gonsalvo lay before Gaeta, he had been intent on collecting such reinforcements as he could from every quarter. The Neapolitan division under Navarro had already joined him, as well as the victorious legions of Andrada from Calabria. His strength was further swelled by the arrival of between two and three thousand troops, Spanish, German, and Italian, which the Castilian minister, Francisco de Rojas, had levied in Rome; and he was in daily hopes of a more important accession from the same quarter, through the good offices of the Venetian ambassador. Lastly, he had obtained some additional recruits, and a remittance of a considerable sum of money, in a fleet of Catalan ships lately arrived from Spain. With all this, however,

* Cicero's country seat stood midway between Gaeta and Mola, the ancient Formiæ, about two miles and a half from each. (Cluverius, Ital. Antiq. lib. iii. c. vi.) The remains of his mansion and of his mausoleum may still be discerned on the borders of the old Appian way by the classical and credulous tourist.

† P. Jovii Vitæ Illustr. Vir. fol. 258, 259.—Chronica del Gr. Capitan, lib. ii. cap. xcv.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 19.—Pet. Martyr, Op. Epistol. ep. cclxi.

a heavy amount of arrears remained due to his troops. In point of numbers he was still far inferior to the enemy; no computation swelling them higher than three thousand horse, two of them light cavalry, and nine thousand foot. The strength of his army lay in his Spanish infantry, on whose thorough discipline, steady nerve, and strong attachment to his person, he felt he might confidently rely. In cavalry, and still more in artillery, he was far below the French, which, together with his great numerical inferiority, made it impossible for him to keep the open country. His only resource was to get possession of some pass or strong position, which lay in their route, where he might detain them till the arrival of further reinforcements should enable him to face them on more equal terms. The deep stream of the Garigliano presented such a line of defence as he wanted.*

On the 6th of October, therefore, the Great Captain broke up his camp at Castellone, and, abandoning the whole region north of the Garigliano to the enemy, struck into the interior of the country, and took post at San Germano, a strong place on

* Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. v. cap. xxxviii. xliii. xlv. xlviii. lvii. — P. Jovii Vitæ Ill. Viror. fol. 258, 259. — Sismondi, Hist. des Français, tom. xv. p. 417. — Garibay, Compend. Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xvi. — Ferreras, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. viii. pp. 252—257. Mariana, Hist. de España, lib. xxvi. cap. v.

The Castilian writers do not state the sum total of the Spanish force, which is to be inferred only from the scattered estimates, careless and contradictory as usual, of the various detachments which joined it.

the other side of the river, covered by the two fortresses of Monte Casino* and Rocca Secca. Into this last he threw a body of determined men under Villalba, and waited calmly the approach of the enemy.

It was not long before the columns of the latter were descried in full march on Ponte Corvo, at a few miles, distance only on the opposite side of the Garigliano. After a brief halt there, they traversed the bridge before that place, and advanced confidently forward in the expectation of encountering little resistance from a foe so much their inferior. In this they were mistaken; the garrison of Rocca Secca, against which they directed their arms, handled them so roughly that, after in vain endeavouring to carry the place in two desperate assaults, the Marquis of Mantua resolved to abandon the attempt altogether, and, recrossing the river, to seek a more practicable point for his purpose lower down.†

Keeping along the right bank, therefore, to the south-east of the mountains of Fondi, he descended nearly to the mouth of the Garigliano, the site, as commonly supposed, of the ancient Minturnæ.‡ The

* The Spaniards carried Monte Casino by storm, and with sacrilegious violence plundered the Benedictine monastery of all its costly plate. They were compelled, however, to respect the bones of the martyrs, and other saintly relics; a division of spoil probably not entirely satisfactory to its reverend inmates. P. Jovii Vitæ Gonzalvi, fol. 262.

† Chron. del Gr. Cap. lib. ii. c. cii.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 21.—Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. tom. i. lib. vi. pp. 326, 327.—P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxvii.—Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. clxxxviii.

‡ The remains of this city,

place was covered by a fortress called the tower of the Garigliano, occupied by a small Spanish garrison, who made some resistance, but surrendered on being permitted to march out with the honours of war. On rejoining their countrymen under Gonsalvo, the latter were so much incensed that the garrison should have yielded on any terms, instead of dying on their posts, that, falling on them with their pikes, they massacred them all to a man. Gonsalvo did not think proper to punish this outrage, which, however shocking to his own feelings, indicated a desperate tone of resolution, which he felt he should have occasion to tax to the utmost in the present exigency.*

The ground now occupied by the armies was low and swampy, a character which it possessed in ancient times; the marshes on the southern side being supposed to be the same in which Marius concealed himself from his enemies during his proscription.†

which stood about four miles above the mouth of the Liris, are still to be seen on the right of the road. In ancient days it was of sufficient magnitude to cover both sides of the river. See Strabo, Geog. lib. v. p. 233; ed. Paris, 1629, with Casaubon's notes, p. 110.

* Chronica del Gr. Cap. lib. ii. c. cvii.—P. Jovii Vita Mag. Gons. fol. 263.

† The marshes of Minturnæ lay between the city and the mouth of the Liris. (Cluverius, Ital. Antiq. lib. iii. cap. x. s. ix.)

The Spanish army encamped, says Guicciardini, "in a place called by Livy from its vicinity to Sessa, aquæ Sinuessanæ, being perhaps the marshes in which Marius hid himself." (Is-tor. lib. vi.) The historian makes two blunders in a breath. 1st, Aquæ Sinuessanæ was a name derived not from Sessa, the ancient Suessa Aurunca, but from the adjacent Sinuessa, a town about ten miles south-east of Minturnæ. (Cf. Livy, lib. xxii. cap. xiv. and Strabo, lib. v. p. 233.) 2d, The name did not

At the present season, its natural humidity was greatly increased by excessive rains, which began earlier and with much more violence than usual. The French position was neither so low nor so wet as that of the Spaniards. It had the advantage, moreover, of being supported by a well-peopled and friendly country in the rear, where lay the large towns of Fondi, Itri, and Gaeta ; while their fleet under the Admiral Prejan, which rode at anchor in the mouth of the Garigliano, might be of essential service in the passage of the river.

In order to effect this, the Marquis of Mantua prepared to throw a bridge across, at a point not far from Trajetto. He succeeded in it, notwithstanding the swollen and troubled condition of the waters,* in a few days, under cover of the artillery, which he had planted on the bank of the river, and which from its greater elevation entirely commanded the opposite shore.

The bridge was constructed of boats belonging to indicate marshes, but natural hot springs, particularly noted for their salubrity. “Salubritate harum aquarum,” says Tacitus in allusion to them, (Annal. lib. xii.) and Pliny notices their medicinal properties more explicitly. Hist. Nat. lib. xxxi. cap. ii.

* This does not accord with Horace’s character of the Garigliano, the ancient Liris, as the “taciturnus amnis,” (Carmin. lib. i. 30.) and still less with that of Silius Italicus :

“Liris . . qui fonte quieto Dissimulat cursum, et nullo mutabilis imbre Perstringit tacitas gemmanti gurgite ripas.”
Punic. lib. iv.

Indeed, the stream exhibits at the present day the same soft and tranquil aspect celebrated by the Roman poets. Its natural character, however, was entirely changed at the period before us, in consequence of the unexampled heaviness and duration of the autumnal rains.

the fleet, strongly secured together and covered with planks. The work being completed, on the 6th of November, the army advanced upon the bridge, supported by such a lively cannonade from the batteries along the shore, as made all resistance on the part of the Spaniards ineffectual. The impetuosity with which the French rushed forward was such as to drive back the advanced guard of their enemy, which giving way in disorder retreated on the main body. Before the confusion could extend further, Gonsalvo, mounted à la ginete, in the manner of the light cavalry, rode through the broken ranks, and, rallying the fugitives, quickly brought them to order. Navarro and Andrada, at the same time, led up the Spanish infantry, and the whole column charging furiously against the French, compelled them to falter, and at length to fall back on the bridge.

The struggle now became desperate ; officers and soldiers, horse and foot, mingling together, and fighting hand to hand, with all the ferocity kindled by close personal combat. Some were trodden under the feet of the cavalry, many more were forced from the bridge, and the waters of the Garigliano were covered with men and horses, borne down by the current, and struggling in vain to gain the shore. It was a contest of mere bodily strength and courage, in which skill and superior tactics were of little avail. Among those who most distinguished themselves, the name of the noble Italian Fabricio Colonna is particularly mentioned. An heroic action is recorded also of a person of inferior rank, a Spanish alferez, or standard bearer, named Illescas. The right hand of this man was shot away by a cannon-ball; as a comrade was raising up the fallen colours, the gallant ensign resolutely grasped them, exclaiming that "he had one hand still left." At the same time, muffling a scarf round the bleeding stump, he took his place in the ranks as before. This brave deed did not go unrewarded, and a liberal pension was settled on him at Gonsalvo's instance.

During the heat of the mêlée the guns on the French shore had been entirely silent, as they could not be worked without doing as much mischief to their own men as the Spaniards, with whom they were closely mingled. But as the French gradually recoiled before their impetuous adversaries, fresh bodies of the latter rushing forward to support their advance, necessarily exposed a considerable length of column to the range of the French guns, which opened a galling fire on the further extremity of the bridge. The Spaniards, notwithstanding "they threw themselves into the face of the cannon," as the Marquis of Mantua exclaimed, "with as much unconcern as if their bodies had been made of air instead of flesh and blood," found themselves so much distressed by this terrible fire, that they were compelled to fall back; and the van, thus left without support, at length retreated in turn, abandoning the bridge to the enemy.*

* Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. clxxxviii. — Abarca, Reyes

This action was one of the severest which occurred in these wars. Don Hugo de Moncada, the veteran of many a fight by land and sea, told Paolo Giovio, that "he had never felt himself in such imminent peril in any of his battles as in this."* The French, notwithstanding they remained masters of the contested bridge, had met with a resistance which greatly discouraged them ; and, instead of attempting to push their success further, retired that same evening to their quarters on the other side of the river. The tempestuous weather, which continued with unabated fury, had now broken up the roads, and converted the soil into a morass, which was nearly impracticable for the movements of horse, and quite so for those of the artillery, on which the French chiefly relied ; while it interposed comparatively slight obstacles to the manœuvres of infantry, which constituted the strength of the Spaniards. From a consideration of these circumstances, the French commander resolved not to resume active operations till a change of weather, by restoring the roads, should enable him to do so with advantage. Meanwhile he constructed a redoubt on the Spanish extremity of the bridge, and threw a body de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xiv.—Garibay, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xix. c. xvi.—Martyr, Opus Ep. ep. cclxix.—P. Jovii Vitæ, fol. 262—264.—Ulloa, Carlo V. fol. 22.—Machiavelli, Legaz. I. a Roma, Lett. xi. Nov. 10.—16. Nov.

13.—17. — Chronica del Gr. Cap. lib. ii. cap. cvi. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 440, 441.

* P. Jovii Vitæ Ill. Viror. fol. 264.

of troops into it, in order to command the pass, whenever he should be disposed to use it.*

While the hostile armies thus lay facing each other, the eyes of all Italy were turned to them, in anxious expectation of a battle, which should finally decide the fate of Naples. Expresses were daily despatched from the French camp to Rome, whence the ministers of the different European powers transmitted the tidings to their respective governments. Machiavelli represented at that time the Florentine republic at the papal court, and his correspondence teems with as many floating rumours and speculations as a modern gazette. There were many French residents in the city with whom the minister was personally acquainted. He frequently notices their opinions on the progress of the war, which they regarded with the most sanguine confidence, as sure to result in the triumph of their own arms, when once fairly brought into collision with the enemy. The calmer and more penetrating eye of the Florentine discerns symptoms in the condition of the two armies of quite a different tendency.†

* Guicciardini, Istoria, lib. vi. pp. 327. 328.—P. Jovii Vitæ, fol. 262.—Machiavelli, Legaz. I. a Roma, Lett. xxix.—Garnier, tom. v. pp. 443—445.

† Legazione Prima a Roma, Lett. ix. x. xviii.

The French showed the same confidence from the beginning of hostilities. One of that nation having told Suarez, the Castilian minister at Venice, that the Marshal de la Tremouille said, "He would give 20,000 ducats, if he could meet Gonsalvo de Cordova in the plains of Viterbo;" the Spaniard smartly replied, "Nemours

It seemed now obvious that victory must declare for that party which could best endure the hardships and privations of its present situation. The local position of the Spaniards was far more unfavourable than that of the enemy. The Great Captain, soon after the affair of the bridge, had drawn off his forces to a rising ground about a mile from the river, which was crowned by the little hamlet of Cintura, and commanded the route to Naples. In front of his camp he sunk a deep trench, which, in the saturated soil, speedily filled with water; and he garished it at each extremity with a strong redoubt. Thus securely intrenched, he resolved patiently to await the movements of the enemy.

The situation of the army, in the mean time, was indeed deplorable. Those who occupied the lower level were up to their knees in mud and water, for the excessive rains, and the inundation of the Garigliano, had converted the whole country into a mere quagmire, or rather standing pool. The only way in which the men could secure themselves was by covering the earth as far as possible with boughs and bundles of twigs, and it was altogether uncertain how long even this expedient would serve against the encroaching element. Those on the higher grounds were scarcely in better plight. The driving storms of sleet and rain, which had continued for several weeks without intermission, found their way would have given twice as much not to have met him at Cerignola." Zurita, Anal. de Arag.

tom. v. lib. v. c. xxxvi.

into every crevice of the flimsy tents and crazy hovels, thatched only with branches of trees, which afforded a temporary shelter to the troops. In addition to these evils, the soldiers were badly fed, from the difficulty of finding resources in the waste and depopulated regions in which they were quartered,* and badly paid, from the negligence, or rather poverty, of King Ferdinand, whose inadequate remittances to his general exposed the latter, among many other embarrassments, to the imminent hazard of disaffection among the soldiery, especially the foreign mercenaries, which nothing, indeed, but the most delicate and judicious conduct on his part could have averted.†

In this difficult crisis, Gonsalvo de Cordova retained all his usual equanimity, and even the cheerfulness so indispensable in a leader who would infuse heart into his followers. He entered freely into the distresses and personal feelings of his men, and, instead of assuming any exemption from fatigue or suffering on the score of his own rank, took his turn in the humblest tour of duty with the meanest of

* This barren tract of uninhabited country must have been of very limited extent; for it lay in the Campania Felix, in the neighbourhood of the cultivated plains of Sessa, the Masican mountain, and Falernian fields,—names, which call up associations, that must live while good poetry and good wine shall be held in honour.

† Mariana, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. c. v.—Guicciardini, Istor. d' Italia, tom. i. lib. vi. p. 328. — Machiavelli, Legazione Prima a Roma, Lett. xlv.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 22.—Chron. del Gran Capitán, cap. cvii. cviii.—The Neapolitan conquests, it will be remembered, were undertaken exclusively for the crown of Aragon, the revenues of which were far more limited than those of Castile.

them, mounting guard himself, it is said, on more than one occasion. Above all, he displayed that inflexible constancy which enables the strong mind in the hour of darkness and peril to buoy up the sinking spirits around him. A remarkable instance of this fixedness of purpose occurred at this time.

The forlorn condition of the army, and the indefinite prospect of its continuance, raised a natural apprehension in many of the officers that, if it did not provoke some open act of mutiny, it would in all probability break down the spirits and constitution of the soldiers. Several of them, therefore,—among the rest, Mendoza and the two Colonnas,—waited on the commander-in-chief, and, after stating their fears without reserve, besought him to remove the camp to Capua, where the troops might find healthy and commodious quarters, at least until the severity of the season was mitigated; before which, they insisted, there was no reason to anticipate any movement on the part of the French. But Gonsalvo felt too deeply the importance of grappling with the enemy, before they should gain the open country, to be willing to trust to any such precarious contingency. Besides, he distrusted the effect of such a retrograde movement on the spirits of his own troops. He had decided on his course after the most mature deliberation, and, having patiently heard his officers to the end, replied in these few but memorable words: “It is indispensable to the public service to maintain our present position; and, be assured, I would sooner march forward two steps, though it should bring me to my grave, than fall back one to gain a hundred years." The decided tone of the reply relieved him from further importunity.*

There is no act of Gonsalvo's life which, on the whole, displays more strikingly the strength of his character. When thus witnessing his faithful followers drooping and dying around him, with the consciousness that a word could relieve them from all their distresses, he yet refrained from uttering it, in stern obedience to what he regarded as the call of duty; and this too, on his own responsibility, in opposition to the remonstrances of those on whose judgment he most relied.

Gonsalvo confided in the prudence, sobriety, and excellent constitution of the Spaniards, for resisting the bad effects of the climate. He relied too on their tried discipline, and their devotion to himself, for carrying them through any sacrifice he should demand of them. His experience at Barleta led him to anticipate results of a very opposite character with the French troops. The event justified his conclusions in both respects.

The French, as already noticed, occupied higher and more healthy ground, on the other side of the

* Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. clxxxviii. — Chronica del Gran Cap. lib. ii. cap. cviii. — Garibay, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib.

xix. cap. xvi. — Guicciardini, Istoria, lib. vi. p. 328. — Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. lviii.

Garigliano, than their rivals. They were fortunate enough also to find more effectual protection from the weather in the remains of a spacious amphitheatre, and some other edifices, which still covered the site of Minturnæ. With all this, however, they suffered more severely from the inclement season than their robust adversaries. Numbers daily sickened and died. They were much straitened, moreover, from want of provisions, through the knavish peculations of the commissaries who had charge of the magazines in Rome. Thus situated, the fiery spirits of the French soldiery, eager for prompt and decisive action, but impatient of delay, gradually sunk under the long protracted miseries of a war where the elements were the principal enemy, and where they saw themselves gradually melting away like slaves in a prison ship, without the chance even of winning an honourable death on the field of battle.*

The discontent occasioned by these circumstances was further swelled by the imperfect success which had attended their efforts, when allowed to measure weapons with the enemy.

At length the latent mass of disaffection found an object on which to vent itself in the person of their commander-in-chief the Marquis of Mantua, never popular with the French soldiers. They now loudly taxed him with imbecility, accused him of a secret understanding with the enemy, and loaded him with the opprobrious epithets with which Transalpine insolence was accustomed to stigmatize the Italians. In all this, they were secretly supported by Ives d'Allègre, Sandricourt, and other French officers, who had always regarded with dissatisfaction the elevation of the Italian general; till at length the latter, finding he had influence neither with officers nor soldiers, and unwilling to retain command where he had lost authority, availed himself of a temporary illness, under which he was labouring, to throw up his commission, and withdrew abruptly to his own estates.

* P. Jovii Vita Mag. Gons. fol. 265.—Garnier, tom. v. p. 445.—Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. v. cap. lix. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, fol. 85.—Alf. de Ulloa, fol. 22.—Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i. pp. 401, 402.

He was succeeded by the Marquis of Saluzzo, an Italian indeed by birth, being a native of Piedmont, but who had long served under the French banners, where he had been intrusted by Louis XII. with very important commands. He was not deficient in energy of character, or military science; but it required powers of a higher order than his to bring the army under subordination, and renew its confidence under present circumstances. The Italians, disgusted with the treatment of their ancient chief, deserted in great numbers. The great body of the French chivalry, impatient of their present unhealthy position, dispersed among the adjacent cities of Fondi, Itri, and Gaeta, leaving the low country around the tower of the Garigliano to the care of the Swiss and German infantry. Thus, while the whole Spanish army lay within a mile of the river, under the immediate eye of their commander, prepared for instant service, the French were scattered over a country more than ten miles in extent, where, without regard to military discipline, they sought to relieve the dreary monotony of a camp by all the relaxations which such comfortable quarters could afford.*

It must not be supposed that the repose of the two armies was never broken by the sounds of war. More than one rencontre, on the contrary, with various fortune, took place, and more than one display of personal prowess by the knights of the two nations, as formerly at the siege of Barleta. The Spaniards made two unsuccessful efforts to burn the enemy's bridge; but they succeeded, on the other hand, in carrying the strong fortress of Rocca Guglielma, garrisoned by the French. Among the feats of individual heroism, the Castilian writers expatiate most complacently on that of their favourite cavalier Diego de Paredes, who descended alone on the bridge against a body of French knights, all armed in proof, with a desperate hardihood worthy of Don Quixote; and would most probably have shared the usual fate of that renowned personage on such occasions, had he not been rescued by a sally of his own countrymen. The French find a counterpart to this adventure in that of the preux chevalier Bayard, who with his single arm maintained the barriers of the bridge against two hundred Spaniards for an hour or more.*

* Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 440—443.—P. Jo-vii Vitæ, fol. 264, 265.—Guic-ciardini, tom. i. lib. vi. p. 329.

—Machiavelli, Legazione Prima a Roma, Lett. xlv.—St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis XII. pp. 173, 174.

Such feats, indeed, are more easily achieved with the pen than the sword. It would be injustice, however, to the honest chronicler of the day to suppose that he did not himself fully

“ Believe the magic wonders that he sung.”

Every heart confessed the influence of a romantic age,—the dying age, indeed, of chivalry,—but when, with superior refinement, it had lost nothing of the enthusiasm and exaltation of its prime. A shadowy twilight of romance enveloped every object. Every day gave birth to such extravagances, not merely of sentiment but of action, as made it difficult to discern the precise boundaries of fact and fiction. The chronicler might innocently encroach sometimes on the province of the poet, and the poet occasionally draw the theme of his visions from the pages of the chronicler. Such in fact was the case; and the romantic Muse of Italy, then coming forth in her glory, did little more than give a brighter flush of colour to the chimeras of real life. The characters of living heroes, a Bayard, a Paredes, and a La Palice, readily supplied her with the elements of those ideal combinations in which she has so gracefully embodied the perfections of chivalry.*

* Chronica del Gran Capitán, lib. ii. cap. cvi.—Mém. de Bayard, ch. xxv. ap. Coll. des Mém. tom. xv.—Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i. p. 417.—

Quintana, Vidas de Español. Cel. tom. i. pp. 288—290.—Machiavelli, Legazione Prima a Roma, Lett. xxxix. xlv.

* Compare the prose romances of Auton, of the "loyal serviteur" of Bayard, and the no less loyal biographer of the Great Captain, with the poetic ones of Ariosto, Berni, and the like.

"Magnanima menzogna! or quando è il vero Si bello, che si possa a te preporre?"

CHAPTER XV.

ITALIAN WARS.—ROUT OF THE GARIGLIANO.—TREATY WITH FRANCE.—GONSALVO'S MILITARY CONDUCT.

1503, 1504.

SEVEN weeks had now elapsed since the two armies had lain in sight of each other without any decided movement on either side. During this time the Great Captain had made repeated efforts to strengthen himself, through the intervention of the Spanish ambassador Francisco de Rojas,* by reinforcements from Rome. His negotiations were chiefly directed to secure the alliance of the Orsini, a powerful family, long involved in a bitter feud with the Colonnas, then in the Spanish service. A reconciliation between these noble houses was at length happily effected, and Bartholomeo d'Alviano, the head of the Orsini, agreed to enlist under the

* He succeeded Garcilasso de la Vega at the court of Rome. Oviedo says, in reference to the illustrious house of Rojas, "En todas las historias de España no se hallan tantos caballeros de un linage y nombre notados por valerosos caballeros y valientes milites como deste nombre de Rojas." Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 2, dial. 8.

Spanish commander with 3000 men. This arrangement was finally brought about through the good offices of the Venetian minister at Rome, who even advanced a considerable sum of money towards the payment of the new levies.*

The appearance of this corps, with one of the most able and valiant of the Italian captains at its head, revived the drooping spirits of the camp. Soon after his arrival, Alviano strongly urged Gonzalvo to abandon his original plan of operations, and avail himself of his augmented strength to attack the enemy in his own quarters. The Spanish commander had intended to confine himself wholly to the defensive, and, too unequal in force to meet the French in the open field, as before noticed, had intrenched himself in his present strong position, with the fixed purpose of awaiting the enemy there. Circumstances had now greatly changed. The original inequality was diminished by the arrival of the Italian levies, and still further compensated by the present disorderly state of the French army. He knew, moreover, that in the most perilous enterprises, the assailing party gathers an enthusiasm and an impetus in its career, which counterbalance large numerical odds, while the party taken by surprise is proportionably disconcerted, and prepared, as it were, for defeat before a blow is struck. From these considerations, the cautious general acquiesced in Alviano's project to cross the Garigliano, by establishing a bridge at a point opposite Suzio, a small place on the right bank garrisoned by the French, about four miles above their head-quarters. The time for the attack was fixed as soon as possible after the approaching Christmas, when the French, occupied with the festivities of the season, might be thrown off their guard.*

* Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. v.—Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. lib. vi. pp. 319, 320.—Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. xlviii. lvii.—

Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xiv. sec. iv. v.—Daru, Hist. de Venise, tom. iii. pp. 364, 365.

This day of general rejoicing to the Christian world at length arrived. It brought little joy to the Spaniards, buried in the depths of these dreary morasses, destitute of most of the necessaries of life, and with scarcely any other means for resisting the climate than those afforded by their iron constitutions and invincible courage. They celebrated the day, however, with all the devotional feeling and the imposing solemnities with which it is commemorated by the Roman Catholic church; and the exercises of religion, rendered more impressive by their situation, served to exalt still higher the heroic constancy which had sustained them under such unparalleled sufferings.

In the mean while, the materials for the bridge were collected, and the work went forward with such despatch, that on the 28th of December all was in readiness for carrying the plan of attack into execution. The task of laying the bridge across the river was intrusted to Alviano, who had charge of the van. The central and main division of the army under Gonsalvo was to cross at the same point; while Andrada, at the head of the rear-guard, was to force a passage at the old bridge, lower down the stream, opposite the tower of the Garigliano.*

* P. Jovii Vitæ Ill. Viror. pp. 267, 268.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 22.—Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. tom. i. lib. vi. pp. 329, 330.—Machiavelli, Legazione Prima a Roma, Lett. xxxvi.

The night was dark and stormy. Alviano performed the duty intrusted to him with such silence and celerity, that the work was completed without attracting the enemy's notice. He then crossed over with the vanguard, consisting chiefly of cavalry, supported by Navarro, Paredes, and Pizarro; and, falling on the sleeping garrison of Suzio, cut all to pieces who offered resistance.

The report of the Spaniards having passed the river spread far and wide, and soon reached the headquarters of the Marquis of Saluzzo, near the tower of the Garigliano. The French commander-in-chief, who believed the Spaniards were lying on the other side of the river as torpid as the snakes in their own marshes, was as much astounded by the event as if a thunderbolt had burst over his head from a cloudless sky. He lost no time, however, in rallying such of his scattered forces as he could assemble, and in the mean while despatched Ives d'Allègre with a body of horse to hold the enemy in check till he could make good his own retreat on Gaeta. His first step was to demolish the bridge near his own quarters, cutting the moorings of the boats and turning them adrift down the river. He abandoned his tents and baggage, together with nine of his heaviest cannon, leaving even the sick and wounded to the mercy of the enemy, rather than encumber himself with anything that should retard his march. The remainder of the artillery he sent forward in the van. The infantry followed next; and the rear, in which Saluzzo took his own station, was brought up by the men-at-arms, to cover the retreat.

* Chronica del Gr. Capitan, lib. ii. cap. cx.—Bernaldez, Hist. de los Reyes, MS. cap. clxxxix.—P. Jovii Vita Magni Gonsalvi, lib. iii. fol. 266.—Zurita,

Hist. tom. i. lib. v. cap. lx.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epistolar. ep. cclxx.—Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 84.

Before Allègre could reach Suzio, the whole Spanish army had passed the Garigliano, and formed on the right bank. Unable to face such superior numbers, he fell back with precipitation, and joined himself to the main body of the French, now in full retreat on Gaeta.*

Gonsalvo, afraid the French might escape him, sent forward Prospero Colonna, with a corps of light horse, to annoy and retard their march until he could come up. Keeping the right bank of the river with the main body, he marched rapidly through the deserted camp of the enemy, leaving little leisure for

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. clxxxix. —Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 22, 23.—Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. p. 330.—Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 448, 449.—Chron. del Gr. Capitan, lib. ii. cap. cx. —Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom.

ii. Rey xxx. cap. xiv. sec. vi.—Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. v. cap. lx.—Barthol. Senarega, De Reb. Genuens. ap. Muratori, Rer. Italic. Script. tom. xxiv. p. 579.

his men to glean the rich spoil which lay tempting them on every side. It was not long before he came up with the French, whose movements were greatly retarded by the difficulty of dragging their guns over the ground completely saturated with rain. The retreat was conducted, however, in excellent order; they were eminently favoured by the narrowness of the road, which, allowing but a comparatively small body of troops on either side to come into action, made success chiefly depend on the relative merits of these. The French rear, as already stated, was made up of their men-at-arms, including Bayard, Sandricourt, La Fayette, and others of their bravest chivalry, who, armed at all points, found no great difficulty in beating off the light troops which formed the advance of the Spaniards. At every bridge, stream, and narrow pass, which afforded a favourable position, the French cavalry closed their ranks, and made a resolute stand to gain time for the columns in advance.

In this way, alternately halting and retreating, with perpetual skirmishes, though without much loss on either side, they reached the bridge before Mola di Gaeta. Here some of the gun-carriages breaking down, or being overturned, occasioned considerable delay and confusion. The infantry pressing on became entangled with the artillery. The Marquis of Saluzzo endeavoured to avail himself of the strong position afforded by the bridge to restore order. A desperate struggle ensued. The French knights dashed boldly into the Spanish ranks, driving back for a time the tide of pursuit. The Chevalier Bayard; who was seen as usual in the front of danger, had three horses killed under him, and at length carried forward by his ardour into the thickest of the enemy, was retrieved with difficulty from their hands by a desperate charge of his friend Sandricourt.*

The Spaniards, shaken by the violence of the assault, seemed for a moment to hesitate; but Gonsalvo had now time to bring up his men-at-arms, who sustained the faltering columns, and renewed the combat on more equal terms. He himself was in the hottest of the mêlée; and at one time was exposed to imminent hazard by his horse's losing his footing on the slippery soil, and coming with him to the ground. The general fortunately experienced no injury, and, quickly recovering himself, continued to animate his followers by his voice and intrepid bearing as before.

The fight had now lasted two hours. The Spaniards, although still in excellent heart, were faint with fatigue and want of food, having travelled six leagues, without breaking their fast since the preceding evening. It was, therefore, with no little anxiety that Gonsalvo looked for the coming up of his rear-guard, left, as the reader will remember, under Andrada at the lower bridge, to decide the fortune of the day.

* Guicciardini, Istoria, lib. vi. pp. 330, 331.—Garnier, tom. v. pp. 449—451.—Chron. del Gr. Cap. ubi supra.—Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i. pp. 416—418.—Scipione Ammirato, Istor.

Fiorentine, tom. iii. lib. xxviii. p. 273. — Summonte, Storia di Napoli, tom. iii. p. 555.—Buonaccorsi, Diario, pp. 84, 85.—P. Jovii Vita Gonsalvi, fol. 268.

The welcome spectacle at length presented itself. The dark columns of the Spaniards were seen, at first faint in the distance, by degrees growing more and more distinct to the eye. Andrada had easily carried the French redoubt on his side of the Garigliano, but it was not without difficulty and delay that he recovered the scattered boats which the French had set adrift down the stream, and finally succeeded in reëstablishing his communications with the opposite bank. Having accomplished this, he rapidly advanced by a more direct road to the east of that lately traversed by Gonsalvo along the sea-side, in pursuit of the French. The latter beheld with dismay the arrival of this fresh body of troops, who seemed to have dropped from the clouds on the field of battle. They scarcely waited for the shock before they broke, and gave way in all directions. The disabled carriages of the artillery, which clogged up the avenues in the rear, increased the confusion among the fugitives, and the foot were trampled down without mercy under the heels of their own cavalry, in the eagerness of the latter to extricate themselves from their perilous situation. The Spanish light horse followed up their advantage with the alacrity of vengeance long delayed, inflicting bloody retribution for all they had so long suffered in the marshes of Sessa.

At no great distance from the bridge the road takes two directions, the one towards Itri, the other to Gaeta. The bewildered fugitives here separated; by far the greater part keeping the last route. Gonsalvo sent forward a body of horse under Navarro and Pedro de la Paz, by a short cut across the country, to intercept their flight. A large number fell into his hands in consequence of this manœuvre, but the greater part of those who escaped the sword succeeded in throwing themselves into Gaeta.*

The Great Captain took up his quarters that night in the neighbouring village of Castellone. His brave followers had great need of refreshment, having fasted and fought through the whole day, and that under a driving storm of rain which had not ceased for a moment. Thus terminated the battle, or rout, as it is commonly called, of the Garigliano, the most important in its results of all Gonsalvo's victories, and furnishing a suitable close to his brilliant military career.† The loss of the French is computed at

* Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. cxc. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 452, 453. — Alf. de Ulloa, fol. 23. — Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. lib. vi. p. 331. — Garibay, Compend. Hist. de Esp. tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xvi. — Chron. del Gr. Cap. ubi sup. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, pp. 84, 85. — Scip. Ammirato, Ist. Fiorent. ubi sup. — Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i. pp. 416—418.

† Soon after the rout of the Garigliano, Bembo produced the following sonnet, which most critics agree was intended, although no name appears in it, for Gonsalvo de Cordova.

“ Ben devria farvi onor d'eterno
esempio
Napoli vostra, e'n mezzo al suo bel monte Scolpirvi in lieta e coronata fronte
Gir trionfando, e dar i vot
al tempio :
Poi che l'avete all' orgoglioso
ed empio

Stuolo

from three to four thousand men, left dead on the field, together with all their baggage, colours, and splendid train of artillery. The Spaniards must have suffered severely during the sharp conflict on the bridge; but no estimate of their loss is to be met with in any native or foreign writer.* It was observed that the 29th of December, on which this battle was won, came on Friday, the same ominous day of the week which had so often proved auspicious to the Spaniards under the present reign.†

The disparity of the forces actually engaged was probably not great, since the extent of country over which the French were quartered prevented many of

Stuolo ritolta, e pareggiate
l'onte ;
Or ch' avea più la voglia e le man pronte
A far d'Italia tutta acerbo scempio.
Torcestel voi, Signor, dal corso
ardito,
E foste tal, ch' ancora esser
vrebbe
A por di qua dall' alpe nostra il piede.
L'onda Tirrena del suo sangue crebbe,
E di tronchi restò coperto il
lito,
E gli augelli ne fer secure prede."

Opere, tom. ii. p. 57.

* The curate de los Palacios sums up the loss of the French, from the time of Gonsalvo's occupation of Barleta to the surrender of Gaeta, in the following manner; six thousand prisoners, fourteen thousand killed in battle, a still greater number by exposure and fatigue, besides a considerable body cut off by the peasantry. To balance this bloody roll, he computes the Spanish loss at two hundred slain in the field! Hist. de los Reyes Catolicos, MS. cap. cxci.

† Chronica del Gr. Capitan, lib. ii. cap. cx. — Zurita, ubi supra.—Garibay, Compend. Hist. lib. xix. cap. xvi. — Quintana, Español. Celebres, tom. i. pp. 296, 297.

Guicciardini, who has been followed in this by the French writers, fixes the date of the rout at the 28th of December. If however it occurred on Friday, as he and every authority, indeed, asserts, it must have been on the 29th, as stated by the Spanish historians. Istor. d'Ital. lib. vi. p. 330.

them from coming up in time for action. Several corps, who succeeded in reaching the field at the close of the fight, were seized with such a panic as to throw down their arms without attempting resistance.* The admirable artillery, on which the French placed chief reliance, was not only of no service, but of infinite mischief to them, as we have seen. The brunt of the battle fell on their chivalry, which bore itself throughout the day with the spirit and gallantry worthy of its ancient renown; never flinching till the arrival of the Spanish rear-guard, fresh on the field, at so critical a juncture, turned the scale in their adversaries' favour.

Early on the following morning, Gonsalvo made preparations for storming the heights of Mount Orlando, which overlooked the city of Gaeta. Such was the despondency of its garrison, however, that this strong position, which bade defiance a few months before to the most desperate efforts of Spanish valour, was now surrendered without a struggle. The same feeling of despondency had communicated itself to the garrison of Gaeta; and before Navarro could bring the batteries of Mount Orlando to bear upon the city, a flag of truce arrived from the Marquis of Saluzzo with proposals for capitulation.

This was more than the Great Captain could have ventured to promise himself. The French were in great force; the fortifications of the place in excellent repair; it was well provided with artillery and ammunition, and with provisions for ten days at least ; while their fleet riding in the harbour afforded the means for obtaining supplies from Leghorn, Genoa, and other friendly ports. But the French had lost all heart ; they were sorely wasted by disease ; their buoyant self-confidence was gone, and their spirits broken by the series of reverses which had followed without interruption from the first hour of the campaign to the last disastrous affair of the Garigliano. The very elements seemed to have leagued against them. Further efforts they deemed a fruitless struggle against destiny ; and they now looked with melancholy longing to their native land, eager only to quit these ill-omened shores for ever.

* P. Jovii Vita Magni Gons. fol. 268.

The Great Captain made no difficulty in granting such terms as, while they had a show of liberality, secured him the most important fruits of victory. This suited his cautious temper far better than pressing a desperate foe to extremity. He was, moreover, with all his successes, in no condition to do so ; he was without funds, and, as usual, deeply in arrears to his army ; while there was scarcely a ration of bread, says an Italian historian, in his whole camp.*

1504. It was agreed by the terms of capitulation,

* P. Jovii Vita Gonsalv. fol. 268, 269.—Chron. del Gr. Capitán, lib. ii. cap. cxi.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxx.—Guicciardini, Istoria, lib. vi. p. 331.—Zurita, Anal. de Arag.

tom. v. lib. v. cap. lxi.—Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 454, 455.—Sismondi, Hist. des Français, tom. xv. cap. xxix.

January 1st, 1504, that the French should evacuate Gaeta at once, and deliver it up to the Spaniards; with its artillery, munitions, and military stores of every description. The prisoners on both sides, including those taken in the preceding campaign, an arrangement greatly to the advantage of the enemy, were to be restored; and the army in Gaeta was to be allowed a free passage by land or sea, as they should prefer, to their own country.*

From the moment hostilities were brought to a

* Zurita, Hist. tom. i. lib. v. cap. lxi. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. pp. 454, 455. — Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. cxc. — Giannone, Ist. d'Italia, lib. xxix. cap. iv.

No particular mention was made of the Italian allies in the capitulation. It so happened that several of the great Angevin lords, who had been taken in the preceding campaigns of Calabria, were found in arms in the place. (P. Jovii Vita Magn. Gonsalvi, fol. 252, 253. 269.) Gonsalvo, in consequence of this manifest breach of faith, refusing to regard them as comprehended in the treaty, sent them all prisoners of state to the dungeons of Castel Nuovo in Naples. This action has brought on him much unmerited obloquy with the French writers. Indeed, before the treaty was signed, if we are to credit the Italian historians, Gonsalvo peremptorily refused to include the Neapolitan lords within it. Thus much is certain; that, after having been taken and released, they were now found under the French banners a second time. It seems not improbable, therefore, that the French, however naturally desirous they may have been of protection for their allies, finding themselves unable to enforce it, acquiesced in such an equivocal silence with respect to them as, without apparently compromising their own honour, left the whole affair to the discretion of the Great Captain.

With regard to the sweeping charge made by certain modern French historians against the Spanish general, of a similar severity to the other Italians indiscriminately, found in the place, there is not the slightest foundation for it in any contemporary authority. See Gaillard, Rivalité, tom. iv. p. 254. — Garnier, Hist. de France, tom. v. p. 456. — Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i. pp. 419, 420.

close, Gonsalvo displayed such generous sympathy for his late enemies, and such humanity in relieving them, as reflect more honour on his character than all his victories. He scrupulously enforced the faithful performance of the treaty, and severely punished any violence offered to the French by his own men. His benign and courteous demeanour towards the vanquished, so remote from the images of terror with which he had been hitherto associated in their minds, excited unqualified admiration; and they testified their sense of his amiable qualities, by speaking of him as the “gentil capitaine et gentil cavalier.” *

The news of the rout of the Garigliano and the surrender of Gaeta diffused general gloom and consternation over France. There was scarcely a family of rank, says a writer of that country, that had not some one of its members involved in these sad disasters.† The court went into mourning. The king, mortified at the discomfiture of all his lofty schemes by the foe whom he despised, shut himself up in his palace, refusing access to every one, until the agitation of his spirits threw him into an illness which had well nigh proved fatal.

* Mém. de Fleurange, chap. v. ap. Coll. des Mém. tom. xvi. — Bernaldez, MS. cap. cxc. — P. Jovii Vitæ, fol. 269, 270. — Chron. del Gr. Capitan, cap. cxi.

† Brantôme, who visited the banks of the Garigliano some fifty years after this, beheld them in imagination thronged with the shades of the illustrious dead, whose bones lay buried in its dreary and pestilent marshes. There is a sombre colouring in the vision of the old chronicler not unpoetical. Vies des Hommes Illustres, Disc. vi.

Meanwhile, his exasperated feelings found an object on which to vent themselves in the unfortunate garrison of Gaeta, who so pusillanimously abandoned their post to return to their own country. He commanded them to winter in Italy, and not to recross the Alps without further orders. He sentenced Sandricourt and Allègre to banishment, for insubordination to their commander-in chief; the latter, for his conduct, more particularly, before the battle of Cerignola; and he hanged up the commissaries of the army, whose infamous peculations had been a principal cause of its ruin.*

But the impotent wrath of their monarch was not needed to fill the bitter cup which the French soldiers were now draining to the dregs. A large number of those who embarked for Genoa died of the maladies contracted during their long bivouac in the marshes of Minturnæ. The rest recrossed the Alps into France, too desperate to heed their master's prohibition. Those who took their way by land suffered still more severely from the Italian peasantry, who retaliated in full measure the barbarities they had so long endured from the French. They were seen wandering like spectres along the high roads and principal cities on the route, pining with cold and famine; and all the hospitals in Rome, as well as the stables, sheds, and every other place, however mean, affording shelter, were filled with the wretched vagabonds, eager only to find some obscure retreat to die in.

* Garnier, Hist. de France, d'Ital. tom. i. lib. vi. pp. 332. tom. v. pp. 456 — 458. — P. 337. — St. Gelais, Hist. de Louis Jovii Vit. Illustr. Viror. fol. XII. p. 173. 269, 270. — Guicciardini, Ist.

The chiefs of the expedition fared little better. Among others, the Marquis of Saluzzo, soon after reaching Genoa, was carried off by a fever caused by his distress of mind. Sandricourt, too haughty to endure disgrace, laid violent hands on himself. Al-lègre, more culpable, but more courageous, survived to be reconciled with his sovereign, and to die a soldier's death on the field of battle.*

Such are the dismal colours in which the French historians depict the last struggle made by their monarch for the recovery of Naples. Few military expeditions have commenced under more brilliant and imposing auspices ; few have been conducted in so ill-advised a manner through their whole progress ; and none attended in their close with more indiscriminate and overwhelming ruin.

On the 3rd of January, 1504, Gonsalvo made his entry into Gaeta ; and the thunders of his ordnance, now for the first time heard from its battlements, announced that this strong key to the dominions of Naples had passed into the hands of Aragon. After a short delay for the refreshment of his troops, he set out for the capital. But amidst the general jubilee which greeted his return, he was seized with a fever brought on by the incessant fatigue and high mental excitement in which he had been kept for the last four months. The attack was severe, and the event for some time doubtful. During this state of suspense the public mind was in the deepest agitation. The popular manners of Gonsalvo had won the hearts of the giddy people of Naples, who transferred their affections, indeed, as readily as their allegiance; and prayers and vows for his restoration were offered up in all the churches and monasteries of the city. His excellent constitution at length got the better of his disease. As soon as this favourable result was ascertained, the whole population, rushing to the other extreme, abandoned itself to a delirium of joy; and when he was sufficiently recovered to give them audience, men of all ranks thronged to Castel Nuovo to tender their congratulations, and obtain a sight of the hero, who now returned to their capital, for the third time, with the laurel of victory on his brow. Every tongue, says his enthusiastic biographer, was eloquent in his praise; some dwelling on his noble port, and the beauty of his countenance; others on the elegance and amenity of his manners; and all dazzled by a spirit of munificence which would have become royalty itself.*

* Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 86. cxc.—P. Jovius, ubi supra.—
—Ulloa, Carlo V. fol. 23.—Gaillard, Rivalité de Fr. et Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. d'Esp. tom. iv. pp. 254—256.

The tide of panegyric was swelled by more than one bard, who sought, though with indifferent success, to catch inspiration from so glorious a theme ; trusting, doubtless, that his liberal hand would not stint the recompense to the precise measure of desert. Amid this general burst of adulation, the muse of Sannazaro, worth all his tribe, was alone silent ; for the trophies of the conqueror were raised on the ruins of that royal house under which the bard had been so long sheltered ; and this silence, so rare in his tuneful brethren, must be admitted to reflect more credit on his name than the best he ever sung.*

* P. Jovii Vita Gonsalv. fol. 270, 271.—Quintana, Vidas, tom. i. p. 298.—Chronica del Gran Cap. lib. iii. cap. i. — Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom. ii. fol. 359.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. cxc. cxci.

The first business of Gonsalvo was to call together the different orders of the state, and receive their oaths of allegiance to King Ferdinand. He next occupied himself with the necessary arrangements for the reorganization of the government, and for reforming various abuses which had crept into the administration of justice more particularly. In these attempts to introduce order he was not a little thwarted, however, by the insubordination of his own soldiery. They loudly clamoured for the discharge of the arrears, still shamefully protracted, till, their discontents swelling to open mutiny, they forcibly seized on two of the principal places in the kingdom as security for the payment. Gonsalvo chastised their insolence by disbanding several of the most refractory companies, and sending them home for punishment. He endeavoured to relieve them in part by raising contributions of the Neapolitans ; but the soldiers took the matter into their own hands, oppressing the unfortunate people on whom they were quartered in a manner which rendered their condition scarcely more tolerable than when exposed to the horrors of actual war.* This was the introduction, according to Guicciardini, of those systematic military exactions in time of peace, which became so common afterwards in Italy, adding an inconceivable amount to the long catalogue of woes which afflicted that unhappy land.†

* P. Jovii Vitæ Ill. Viror. fol. 271.

Amidst his manifold duties, Gonsalvo did not forget the gallant officers who had borne with him the burdens of the war, and he requited their services in a princely style, better suited to his feelings than his interests, as subsequently appeared. Among them were Navarro, Mendoza, Andrada, Benavides, Leyva, the Italians Alviano and the two Colonnas, most of whom lived to display the lessons of tactics, which they imbibed under this great commander, on a still wider theatre of glory, in the reign of Charles V. He made them grants of cities, fortresses, and extensive lands, according to their various claims, to be held as fiefs of the crown. All this was done with the previous sanction of his royal master, Ferdinand the Catholic. They did some violence, however, to his more economical spirit, and he was heard

* “Servire per sempre vincitrice o vinta.”

The Italians began at this early period to feel the pressure of those woes, which a century and a half later wrung out of Filicaja the beautiful lament, which has lost something of its touching graces even under the hand of Lord Byron.

† Zurita, Anale, tom. v. lib. v. c. lxiv.—Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. lib. vi. pp. 340, 341.—Abarca, ubi sup.

somewhat peevishly to exclaim, "It boots little for Gonsalvo de Cordova to have won a kingdom for me, if he lavishes it all away before it comes into my hands." It began to be perceived at court that the Great Captain was too powerful for a subject.*

Meanwhile Louis XII. was filled with serious apprehensions for the fate of his possessions in the north of Italy. His quondam allies, the Emperor Maximilian and the republic of Venice, the latter more especially, had shown many indications, not merely of coldness to himself, but of a secret understanding with his rival, the King of Spain. The restless Pope Julius II. had schemes of his own, wholly independent of France. The republics of Pisa and Genoa, the last one of her avowed dependencies, had entered into correspondence with the Great Captain, and invited him to assume their protection; while several of the disaffected party in Milan had assured him of their active support in case he would march with sufficient force to overturn the existing government. Indeed, not only France, but Europe in general, expected that the Spanish commander would avail himself of the present crisis to push his victorious arms into upper Italy, revolutionize Tuscany in his way, and, wresting Milan from the French, drive them, crippled and disheartened by their late reverses, beyond the Alps.†

* P. Jovii Vitæ, fol. 270, 271. — Chronica del Gran Cap. lib. iii. cap. i. — Ulloa, fol. 24.

† Guicciardini, Istor. d'Ital. lib. vi. p. 338. — Zurita, Hist. de Hern. tom. i. lib. v. cap. lxiv. — Abarca,

But Gonsalvo had plenty of occupation on his hands in settling the disordered state of Naples. King Ferdinand, his sovereign, notwithstanding the ambition of universal conquest absurdly imputed to him by the French writers, had no design to extend his acquisitions beyond what he could permanently maintain. His treasury, never overflowing, was too deeply drained by the late heavy demands on it, for him so soon to embark on another perilous enterprise, that must rouse anew the swarms of enemies who seemed willing to rest in quiet after their long and exhausting struggle; nor is there any reason to suppose he sincerely contemplated such a movement for a moment.*

The apprehension of it, however, answered Ferdinand's purpose, by preparing the French monarch to arrange his differences with his rival, as the latter now earnestly desired, by negotiation. Indeed, two Spanish ministers had resided during the greater part of the war at the French court, in the view of improving the first opening that should occur for accomplishing this object; and by their agency a treaty was concluded, to continue for three years, which guaranteed to Aragon the undisturbed possession of —Abarca, Reyes de Arag. Rey xxx. cap. xiv.—Buonaccorsi, Diario, pp. 85, 86.

* Zur. tom. v. lib. v. cap. lxvi.

The campaign against Louis XII. had cost the Spanish crown 331 cuentos or millions of maravedis, equivalent to 9,268,000 dollars of the present time. A moderate charge enough for the conquest of a kingdom; and made still lighter to the Spaniards by one-fifth of the whole being drawn from Naples itself. See Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. fol. 359.

her conquests during that period. The chief articles provided for the immediate cessation of hostilities between the belligerents, and the complete re-establishment of their commercial relations and intercourse, with the exception of Naples, from which the French were to be excluded. The Spanish crown was to have full power to reduce all refractory places in that kingdom; and the contracting parties solemnly pledged themselves, each to render no assistance, secretly or openly, to the enemies of the other. The treaty, which was to run from the 25th of February 1504, was signed by the French king and the Spanish plenipotentiaries at Lyons, on the 11th of that month, and ratified by Ferdinand and Isabella at the convent of St. Mary de la Mejorada, the 31st of March following.*

There was still a small spot in the heart of Naples, comprehending Venosa, and several adjoining towns, where Louis d'Ars and his brave associates yet held out against the Spanish arms. Although cut off by the operation of this treaty from the hope of further support from home, the French knight disdained to surrender; but sallied out at the head of his little troop of gallant veterans, and thus armed at all points, says Brantôme, with lance in rest, took his way through Naples, and the centre of Italy. He marched in battle array, levying contributions for his support on the places through which he passed. In this way he entered France, and presented himself before the court at Blois. The king and queen, delighted with his prowess, came forward to welcome him, and made good cheer, says the old chronicler, for himself and his companions, whom they recompensed with liberal largesses, proffering at the same time any boon to the brave knight which he should demand for himself. The latter in return simply requested that his old comrade Ives d'Allègre should be recalled from exile. This trait of magnanimity, when contrasted with the general ferocity of the times, has something in it inexpressibly pleasing. It shows, like others recorded of the French gentlemen of that period, that the age of chivalry — the chivalry of romance, indeed,—had not wholly passed away.*

* The treaty is to be found in Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. No. xxvi. pp. 51—53.

— Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. lxiv.—Machiavelli, Legaz. ii. a Francia, Lett. ix. Feb. 11.

The pacification of Lyons sealed the fate of Naples ; and, while it terminated the wars in that kingdom, closed the military career of Gonsalvo de Cordova. It is impossible to contemplate the magnitude of the results achieved with such slender resources, and in the face of such overwhelming odds,—without deep admiration for the genius of the man by whom they were accomplished.

* Brantôme, Œuvres, tom. ii. Disc. xi. — Mem. de Fleurange, ch. v. ap. Coll. des Mém. tom. xvi. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 85.—Gaillard, Rivalité de Fr. et d'Esp. tom. iv. pp. 255 — 260. See also Mémoires du Chevalier Bayard, ch. xxv. The good knight, "sans peur et sans reproche," made one of this intrepid little band, having joined Louis d'Ars after the capitulation of Gaeta.

His success, it is true, is imputable in part to the signal errors of his adversaries. The magnificent expedition of Charles VIII. failed to produce any permanent impression, chiefly in consequence of the precipitation with which it had been entered into, without sufficient concert with the Italian states, who created a formidable enemy when united in his rear. He did not even avail himself of his temporary acquisition of Naples to gather support from the attachment of his new subjects. Far from incorporating with them, he was regarded as a foreigner and an enemy, and as such expelled by the joint action of all Italy from its bosom, as soon as it had recovered sufficient strength to rally.

Louis XII. profited by the errors of his predecessor. His acquisitions in the Milanese formed a basis for future operations ; and by negotiation and otherwise he secured the alliance and the interests of the various Italian governments on his side. These preliminary arrangements were followed by preparations every way commensurate with his object. He failed in the first campaign, however, by intrusting the command to incompetent hands, consulting birth rather than talent or experience.

In the succeeding campaigns, his failure, though partly chargeable on himself, was less so than on circumstances beyond his control. The first of these was the long detention of the army before Rome by Cardinal d'Amboise, and its consequent exposure to the unexampled severity of the ensuing winter ; a second was the fraudulent conduct of the commissaries, inferring no doubt some degree of negligence in the person who appointed them ; and lastly, the want of a suitable commander-in-chief of the army. La Tremouille being ill, and D'Aubigny a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, there appeared no one among the French qualified to cope with the Spanish general. The Marquis of Mantua, independently of the disadvantage of being a foreigner, was too timid in council and dilatory in conduct to be any way competent to this difficult task.

If his enemies, however, committed great errors, it is altogether owing to Gonsalvo that he was in a situation to take advantage of them. Nothing could be more unpromising than his position on first entering Calabria. Military operations had been conducted in Spain on principles totally different from those which prevailed in the rest of Europe. This was especially the case in the late Moorish wars, where the old tactics and the character of the ground brought light cavalry chiefly into use. This, indeed, constituted his principal strength at this period ; for his infantry, though accustomed to irregular service, was indifferently armed and disciplined. An important revolution, however, had occurred in the other parts of Europe. The infantry had there regained the superiority which it maintained in the days of the Greeks and Romans. The experiment had been made on more than one bloody field ; and it was found that the solid columns of Swiss and German pikes not only bore down all opposition in their onward march, but presented an impregnable barrier, not to be shaken by the most desperate charges of the best heavy-armed cavalry. It was against these dreaded battalions that Gonsalvo was now called to measure, for the first time, the bold, but rudely-armed and comparatively raw recruits from Gallicia and the Asturias.

He lost his first battle, into which it should be remembered he was precipitated against his will. He proceeded afterwards with the greatest caution, gradually familiarizing his men with the aspect and usages of the enemy they held in such awe, before bringing them again to a direct encounter. He put himself to school during this whole campaign, carefully acquainting himself with the tactics, discipline, and novel arms of his enemies, and borrowing just so much as he could incorporate into the ancient system of the Spaniards, without discarding the latter altogether. Thus, while he retained the short sword and buckler of his countrymen, he fortified his battalions with a large number of spearmen, after the German fashion. The arrangement is highly commended by the sagacious Machiavelli, who considers it as combining the advantages of both systems ; since, while the long spear served all the purposes of resistance, or even of attack on level ground, the short swords and targets enabled their wearers, as already noticed, to cut in under the dense array of hostile pikes, and bring the enemy to close quarters, where his formidable weapon was of no avail.*

While Gonsalvo made this innovation in the arms and tactics, he paid equal attention to the formation of a suitable character in his soldiery. The circumstances in which he was placed at Barleta, and on the Garigliano, imperatively demanded this. Without food, clothes, or pay, without the chance even of retrieving his desperate condition by venturing a blow at the enemy, the Spanish soldier was required to remain passive. To do this, demanded patience, abstinence, strict subordination, and a degree of resolution far higher than that required to combat obstacles, however formidable in themselves, where active exertion, which tasks the utmost energies of the soldier, renews his spirits and raises them to a contempt of danger. It was calling on him, in short, to begin with achieving that most difficult of all victories, the victory over himself.

All this the Spanish commander effected. He infused into his men a portion of his own invincible energy. He inspired a love of his person, which led them to emulate his example; and a confidence in his genius and resources, which supported them un-

* Machiavelli, Dell' Arte della Guerra, lib. ii.—Machiavelli considers the victory over D'Aubigny at Seminara as imputable in a great degree to the peculiar arms of the Spaniards, who, with their short swords and shields, gliding in among the deep ranks of the Swiss spearmen, brought them to close combat, where the former had the whole advantage. Another instance of the kind occurred at the memorable battle of Ravenna some years later. Loc. cit.

der all their privations by the firm reliance on a fortunate issue. His manners were distinguished by a graceful courtesy, less encumbered with etiquette than usual with persons of his high rank in Castile. He knew well the proud and independent feelings of the Spanish soldier, and, far from annoying him by unnecessary restraints, showed the most liberal indulgence at all times. But his kindness was tempered with severity, which displayed itself, on such occasions as required interposition, in a manner that rarely failed to repress every thing like insubordination. The reader will readily recall an example of this in the mutiny before Taranto; and it was doubtless by the assertion of similar power, that he was so long able to keep in check his German mercenaries, distinguished above the troops of every other nation by their habitual license, and contempt of authority.

While Gonsalvo relied so freely on the hardy constitution and patient habits of the Spaniards, he trusted no less to the deficiency of these qualities in the French, who, unlike the artificial character formed under the stern training of later times, resembled their Gaulish ancestors in the facility with which they were discouraged by unexpected obstacles, and the difficulty with which they could be brought to rally.* In this he did not miscalculate.

* "Prima," says Livy pithily, speaking of the Gauls in the time of the republic, "eorum prælia plus quàm virorum, postrema minus quàm feminarum." Lib. x. cap. xxviii.

The French infantry, drawn from the militia of the country, hastily collected and soon to be disbanded, and the independent nobility and gentry who composed the cavalry service, were alike difficult to be brought within the strict curb of military rule. The severe trials, which steeled the souls and gave sinewy strength to the constitutions of the Spanish soldiers, impaired those of their enemies, introduced divisions in their councils, and relaxed the whole tone of discipline. Gonsalvo watched the operation of all this, and coolly waiting the moment when his weary and disheartened adversary should be thrown off his guard, collected all his strength for a decisive blow by which to terminate the action. Such was the history of those memorable campaigns which closed with the brilliant victories of Cerignola and the Garigliano.

In a review of his military conduct, we must not overlook his politic deportment towards the Italians, altogether the reverse of the careless and insolent bearing of the French. He availed himself liberally of their superior science, showing great deference, and confiding the most important trusts to their officers.* Far from the reserve usually shown to foreigners, he appeared insensible to national distinctions, and ardently embraced them as companions

* Two of the most distinguished of these were the Colonnas, Prospero and Fabricio, of whom frequent mention has been made in our narrative. The best commentary on the military reputation of the latter is the fact, that he is selected by Machiavelli as the principal interlocutor in his Dialogues on the Art of War.

in arms embarked in a common cause with himself. In their tourney with the French before Barleta, to which the whole nation attached such importance as a vindication of national honour, they were entirely supported by Gonsalvo, who furnished them with arms, secured a fair field of fight, and shared the triumph of the victors as that of his own countrymen,—paying those delicate attentions, which cost far less indeed, but to an honourable mind are of greater value, than more substantial benefits. He conciliated the good-will of the Italian states by various important services ; of the Venetians, by his gallant defence of their possessions in the Levant ; of the people of Rome, by delivering them from the pirates of Ostia ; while he succeeded, notwithstanding the excesses of his soldiery, in captivating the giddy Neapolitans to such a degree, by his affable manners and splendid style of life, as seemed to efface from their minds every recollection of the last and most popular of their monarchs, the unfortunate Frederic.

The distance of Gonsalvo's theatre of operations from his own country, apparently most discouraging, proved extremely favourable to his purposes. The troops, cut off from retreat by a wide sea and an impassable mountain barrier, had no alternative but to conquer or to die. Their long continuance in the field without disbanding gave them all the stern, inflexible qualities of a standing army ; and as they served through so many successive campaigns under the banner of the same leader, they were drilled in a system of tactics far steadier and more uniform than could be acquired under a variety of commanders, however able. Under these circumstances, which so well fitted them for receiving impressions, the Spanish army was gradually moulded into the form determined by the will of its great chief.

When we look at the amount of forces at the disposal of Gonsalvo, it appears so paltry, especially compared with the gigantic apparatus of later wars, that it may well suggest disparaging ideas of the whole contest. To judge correctly, we must direct our eyes to the result. With this insignificant force, we shall then see the kingdom of Naples conquered, and the best generals and armies of France annihilated; an important innovation effected in military science; the art of mining, if not invented, carried to unprecedented perfection; a thorough reform introduced in the arms and discipline of the Spanish soldier; and the organization completed of that valiant infantry, which is honestly eulogized by a French writer as irresistible in attack, and impossible to rout;* and which carried the banners of Spain victorious for more than a century over the most distant parts of Europe.

* See Dubos, Hist. de la Ligue de Cambray, Dissert. Prelim. p. 60.—This French writer has shown himself superior to national distinctions, in the liberal testimony which he bears to the character of these brave troops. See a similar strain of panegyric from the chivalrous pen of old Brantôme, Œuvr. tom. i. Disc. xxvii.

The brilliant qualities and achievements of Gonzalo de Cordova have naturally made him a popular theme both for history and romance. Various biographies of him have appeared in the different European languages; though none, I believe, hitherto in English. The authority of principal reference in these pages is the life which Paolo Giovio has incorporated in his great work, "Vitæ Illustrum Virorum," which I have elsewhere noticed. The Life of Gonsalvo is not exempt from the prejudices, as well as minor inaccuracies, which may be charged on most of this author's productions; but these are abundantly compensated by the stores of novel and interesting detail, which Giovio's familiarity with the principal actors of the time enabled him to throw into his work, and by the skilful arrangement of his narrative, so disposed as without studied effort to bring into light the prominent qualities of his hero. Every page bears the marks of that "golden pen" which the politic Italian reserved for his favourites; and while this obvious partiality may put the reader somewhat on his guard, it gives an interest to the work, inferior to none other of his agreeable compositions.

The most imposing of the Spanish memoirs of Gonsalvo, in bulk at least, is the "Chronica del Gran Capitan," Alcalá, 1584. Nic. Antonio doubts whether the author were Pulgar, who wrote the history of the Catholic Kings, of such frequent reference in the Granađine wars, or another Pulgar del Salar, as he is called, who received the honours of knighthood from King Ferdinand for his valorous exploits against the Moors. (See Bibl. Nov. tom. i. p. 387.) With regard to the first Pulgar, there is no reason to suppose that he lived into the sixteenth century; and as to the second, the work composed by him, so far from being the one in question, was a compendium, bearing the title of "Sumario de los Hechos del Gran Capitan," printed as early as 1527, at Seville. (See the editor's prologue to Pulgar's Cronica de los Reyes Catolicos; ed. Valencia, 1780.) Its author, therefore, remains in obscurity. He sustains no great damage on the score of reputation, however, from this circumstance, as his work is but an indifferent specimen of the rich old Spanish chronicle, exhibiting most of its characteristic blemishes, with a very small admixture of its beauties. The long and prosy narrative is overloaded with the most frivolous details, trumpeted forth in a strain of glorification, which sometimes disfigures more meritorious compositions in the Castilian. Nothing like discrimination of character, of course, is to be looked for in the unvarying swell of panegyric, which claims for its subject all the extravagant flights of a hero of romance. With these deductions, however, and a liberal allowance, consequently, for the nationality of the work, it has considerable value as a record of events too recent in their occurrence to be seriously defaced by those deeper stains of error which are so apt to settle on the weather-beaten monuments of antiquity. It has accordingly formed a principal source of the "Vida del Gran Capitan," introduced by Quintana in the first volume of his "Españoles Celebres," printed at Madrid, 1807. This memoir, in which the incidents are selected with discernment, displays the usual freedom and vivacity of its poetic author. It does not bring the general politics of the period under review, but will not be found deficient in particulars having immediate connexion with the personal history of its subject; and, on the whole, exhibits in an agreeable and compendious form whatever is of most interest or importance for the general reader.

The French have also a "Histoire de Gonsalve de Cordoue," composed by Father Duponcet, a Jesuit, in two vols. 12mo. Paris, 1714. Though an ambitious, it is a bungling performance, most unskilfully put together, and contains quite as much of what ~~it~~ ^{he} hero did not do, as what he did. The prolixity of the narrative is not even relieved by that piquancy of style which forms something like a substitute for thought in many of the lower order of French historians. It is less to history, however, than to romance, that the French public is indebted for its conceptions of the character of Gonsalvo de Cordova, as depicted by the gaudy pencil of Florian, in that highly poetic colouring, which is more attractive to the majority of readers than the cold and sober delineations of truth.

The contemporary French accounts of the Neapolitan wars of Louis XII. are extremely meagre, and few in number. The most striking, on the whole, is D'Auton's Chronicle, composed in the true chivalrous vein of old Froissart, but unfortunately terminating before the close of the first campaign. St. Gelais and Claude Seyssel touch very lightly on this part of their subject. History becomes in their hands, moreover, little better than fulsome panegyric, carried to such a height, indeed, by the latter writer, as brought on him the most severe strictures from his contemporaries ; so that he was compelled to take up the pen more than once in his own vindication. The Mémoires de Bayard, Fleurange, and La Tremouille, so diffuse in most military details, are nearly silent in regard to those of the Neapolitan war. The truth is, the subject was too ungrateful in itself, and presented too unbroken a series of calamities and defeats to invite the attention of the French historians, who willingly turned to those brilliant passages in this reign more soothing to national vanity.

The blank has been filled up, or rather attempted to be so, by the assiduity of their later writers. Among these, occasionally consulted by me, are Varillas, whose "Histoire de Louis XII.," loose as it is, rests on a somewhat more solid basis than his metaphysical reveries, assuming the title of "Politique de Ferdinand," already repeatedly noticed ; Garnier, whose perspicuous narrative, if inferior to that of Gaillard in acuteness and epigrammatic point, makes a much nearer approach to truth ; and lastly, Sismondi, who, if he may be charged in his "Histoire des Français" with many of the defects incident to indiscreet rapidity of composition, succeeds by a few brief and animated touches in opening deeper views into character and conduct than can be got from volumes of ordinary writers.

The want of authentic materials for a perfect acquaintance with the reign of Louis XII. is a subject of complaint with French writers themselves. The memoirs of the period, occupied with the more dazzling military transactions, make no attempt to instruct us in the interior organization or policy of the government. One might imagine that their authors lived a century before Philippe de Comines, instead of coming after him, so inferior are they, in all the great properties of historic composition, to this eminent statesman. The French savans have made slender, if any, contributions to the stock of original documents collected more than two centuries ago by Godefroy for the illustration of this reign. It can scarcely be supposed, however, that the labours of this early antiquary exhausted the department, in which the French are rich beyond all others, and that those who work the same mine hereafter, should not find valuable materials for a broader foundation of this interesting portion of their history.

It is fortunate that the reserve of the French in regard to their relations with Italy at this time, has been abundantly compensated by the labours of the most eminent contemporary writers of the latter country, as Bembo, Machiavelli, Giovio, and the philosophic Guicciardini; whose situation, as Italians, enabled them to maintain the balance of historic truth undisturbed, at least by undue partiality for either of the two great rival powers; whose high public stations introduced them to the principal characters of the day, and to springs of action hidden from vulgar eyes; and whose superior science, as well as genius, qualified them for rising above the humble level of garrulous chronicle and memoir to the classic dignity of history. It is with regret that we must now strike into a track unillumined by the labours of these great masters of their art in modern times.

CHAPTER XVI.

ILLNESS AND DEATH OF ISABELLA.—HER CHARACTER.

1504.

THE acquisition of an important kingdom in the heart of Europe, and of the New World beyond the waters, which promised to pour into her lap all the fabled treasures of the Indies, was rapidly raising Spain to the first rank of European powers. But in this noontide of her success she was to experience a fatal shock in the loss of that illustrious personage who had so long and so gloriously presided over her destinies. We have had occasion to notice more than once the declining state of the queen's health during the last few years. Her constitution had been greatly impaired by incessant personal fatigues and exposure, and by the unremitting activity of her mind. It had suffered far more severely, however, from a series of heavy domestic calamities, which had fallen on her with little intermission since the death of her mother in 1496. The next year, she followed to the grave the remains of her only son, the heir and hope of the monarchy, just entering on his prime ; and, in the succeeding, was called on to render the same sad offices to the best-beloved of her daughters, the amiable Queen of Portugal.

The severe illness occasioned by this last blow terminated in a dejection of spirits, from which she never entirely recovered. Her surviving children were removed far from her into distant lands ; with the occasional exception, indeed, of Joanna, who caused a still deeper pang to her mother's affectionate heart, by exhibiting infirmities which justified the most melancholy presages for the future.

Far from abandoning herself to weak and useless repining, however, Isabella sought consolation where it was best to be found, in the exercises of piety, and in the earnest discharge of the duties attached to her exalted station. Accordingly, we find her attentive as ever to the minutest interests of her subjects ; supporting her great minister Ximenes in his schemes of reform, quickening the zeal for discovery in the West, and at the close of the year 1503, on the alarm of the French invasion, rousing her dying energies to kindle a spirit of resistance in her people. These strong mental exertions, however, only accelerated the decay of her bodily strength, which was gradually sinking under that sickness of the heart which admits of no cure, and scarcely of consolation.

In the beginning of that very year she had declined so visibly, that the cortes of Castile, much alarmed, petitioned her to provide for the government of the kingdom after her decease, in case of the absence or incapacity of Joanna.* She seems to have rallied in some measure after this, but it was only to relapse into a state of greater debility, as her spirits sunk under the conviction, which now forced itself on her, of her daughter's settled insanity.

Early in the spring of the following year, 1504, that unfortunate lady embarked for Flanders, where, soon after her arrival, the inconstancy of her husband and her own ungovernable sensibilities occasioned the most scandalous scenes. Philip became openly enamoured of one of the ladies of her suite; and his injured wife, in a paroxysm of jealousy, personally assaulted her fair rival in the palace, and caused the beautiful locks, which had excited the admiration of her fickle husband, to be shorn from her head. This outrage so affected Philip that he vented his indignation against Joanna in the coarsest and most unmanly terms, and finally refused to have any further intercourse with her.†

The account of this disgraceful scene reached Castile in the month of June. It occasioned the deepest chagrin and mortification to the unhappy parents. Ferdinand soon after fell ill of a fever, and the queen was seized with the same disorder, accompanied by more alarming symptoms. Her illness

* Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. xi.—Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. lxxxiv.

† Garibay, Hist. tom ii. lib. xix. c. xvi.—Pet. Martyr, Opus

Epist. ep. cclxxi. cclxxii.—Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximenii, fol. 46.—Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1504.

was exasperated by anxiety for her husband, and she refused to credit the favourable reports of his physicians, while he was detained from her presence. His vigorous constitution, however, threw off the malady, while hers gradually failed under it. Her tender heart was more keenly sensible than his to the unhappy condition of their child, and to the gloomy prospects which awaited her beloved Castile.*

Her faithful follower, Martyr, was with the court at this time in Medina del Campo. In a letter to the Count de Tendilla, dated October 7th, he states that the most serious apprehensions were entertained by the physicians for the queen's fate. "Her whole system," he says, "is pervaded by a consuming fever. She loathes food of every kind, and is tormented with incessant thirst, while the disorder has all the appearances of terminating in a dropsy."†

In the mean while, Isabella lost nothing of her solicitude for the welfare of her people, and the great concerns of government. While reclining, as she was obliged to do great part of the day, on her couch, she listened to the recital or reading of whatever occurred of interest at home or abroad. She gave audience to distinguished foreigners, especially such Italians as could acquaint her with particulars of the late war, and above all in regard to Gonsalvo de Cordova, in whose fortunes she had always taken the liveliest concern.* She received with pleasure, too, such intelligent travellers as her renown had attracted to the Castilian court. She drew forth their stores of various information, and dismissed them, says a writer of the age, penetrated with the deepest admiration of that masculine strength of mind which sustained her so nobly under the weight of a mortal malady.†

* Alvar. Gomecius, fol. 46, — Galindez de Carbajal, MS. 47.— Pet. Martyr, ep. cclxxiii. año 1504.

† Opus Epist. ep. cclxxiv.

This malady was now rapidly gaining ground. On the 15th of October we have another epistle of Martyr, of the following melancholy tenor. "You ask me respecting the state of the queen's health. We sit sorrowful in the palace all day long, tremblingly waiting the hour when religion and virtue shall quit the earth with her. Let us pray that we may be permitted to follow hereafter where she is soon to go. She so far transcends all human excellence, that there is scarcely anything of mortality about her. She can hardly be said to die, but to pass into a nobler existence, which should rather ex-

* A short time before her death, she received a visit from the distinguished officer, Prospero Colonna. The Italian noble, on being presented to King Ferdinand, told him that "he had come to Castile to behold the woman who from her sick bed ruled the world; "ver una señora que desde la cama mandava al mundo." Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 8.

† Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximen. fol. 47.

Among the foreigners introduced to the queen at this time, was a celebrated Venetian traveller, named Vianelli, who presented her with a cross of pure gold set with precious stones, among which was a carbuncle of inestimable value. The liberal Italian met with rather an uncourtly rebuke from Ximenes, who told him, on leaving the presence, that "he had rather have the money his diamonds cost, to spend in the service of the church, than all the gems of the Indies." Ibid.

cite our envy than our sorrow. She leaves the world filled with her renown, and she goes to enjoy life eternal with her God in heaven. I write this," he concludes, "between hope and fear, while the breath is still fluttering within her."*

The deepest gloom now overspread the nation. Even Isabella's long illness had failed to prepare the minds of her faithful people for the sad catastrophe. They recalled several ominous circumstances which had before escaped their attention. In the preceding spring, an earthquake, accompanied by a tremendous hurricane, such as the oldest men did not remember, had visited Andalusia, and especially Carmona, a place belonging to the queen, and occasioned frightful desolation there. The superstitious Spaniards now read in these portents the prophetic signs by which Heaven announces some great calamity. Prayers were put up in every temple; processions and pilgrimages made in every part of the country for the recovery of their beloved sovereign—but in vain.†

Isabella, in the mean time, was deluded with no false hopes. She felt too surely the decay of her bodily strength, and she resolved to perform what temporal duties yet remained for her, while her faculties were still unclouded.

On the 12th of October, 1504, she executed that celebrated testament, which reflects so clearly the peculiar qualities of her mind and character. She begins with prescribing the arrangements for her burial. She orders her remains to be transported to Granada, to the Franciscan monastery of Santa Isabella in the Alhambra, and there deposited in a low and humble sepulchre, without other memorial than a plain inscription on it. "But," she continues, "should the king my lord prefer a sepulchre in some other place, then my will is that my body be there transported, and laid by his side; that the union we have enjoyed in this world, and, through the mercy of God, may hope again for our souls in heaven, may be represented by our bodies in the earth." Then, desirous of correcting by her example, in this last act of her life, the wasteful pomp of funeral obsequies, to which the Castilians were addicted, she commands that her own should be performed in the plainest and most unostentatious manner, and that the sum saved by this economy should be distributed in alms among the poor.

* Opus Epist. ep. cclxxvi.

† Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. cc. cci.—Carbajal, MS. año

1504. — Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xix. c. xvi. — Zuñiga, Anales de Sevilla, pp. 423, 424.

She next provides for several charities, assigning, among others, marriage portions for poor maidens, and a considerable sum for the redemption of Christian captives in Barbary. She enjoins the punctual discharge of all her personal debts within a year; she retrenches superfluous offices in the royal household, and revokes all such grants, whether in the forms of lands or annuities, as she conceives to have been made without sufficient warrant. She inculcates on her successors the importance of maintaining the integrity of the royal domains, and, above all, never to divest themselves of their title to the important fortress of Gibraltar.

After this, she comes to the succession of the crown, which she settles on the Infanta Joanna as “queen proprietor,” and the Archduke Philip as her husband. She gives them much good counsel respecting their future administration; enjoining them, as they would secure the love and obedience of their subjects, to conform in all respects to the laws and usages of the realm, to appoint no foreigner to office, — an error into which Philip’s connexions, she saw, would be very likely to betray them, — and to make no laws nor ordinances, “which necessarily require the consent of cortes,” during their absence from the kingdom.* She commends to them the same conjugal harmony which had ever subsisted between her and her husband; she beseeches them to show the latter all the deference and filial affection “due to him beyond every other parent, for his eminent virtues;” and finally inculcates on them the most tender regard for the liberties and welfare of their subjects.

She next comes to the great question proposed by

* “Ni fagan fuera de los dichos mis Reynos è Señorios, Leyes, e Prematicas, ni las otras cosas que en Cortes se deven hazer segund las Leyes de ellos;” (Testamento, ap. Dormer, Dis-ursos Varios, p. 343;) an honourable testimony to the legislative rights of cortes, which contrasts strongly with the despotic assumption of preceding and succeeding princes.

the cortes of 1503, respecting the government of the realm in the absence or incapacity of Joanna. She declares that, after mature deliberation, and with the advice of many of the prelates and nobles of the kingdom, she appoints King Ferdinand her husband to be sole regent of Castile in that exigency, until the majority of her grandson Charles ; being led to this, she adds, “ by the consideration of the magnanimity and illustrious qualities of the king my lord, as well as his large experience, and the great profit which will redound to the state from his wise and beneficent rule.” She expresses her sincere conviction, that his past conduct affords sufficient guarantee for his faithful administration ; but, in compliance with established usage, requires the customary oath from him on entering on the duties of the office.

She next makes a specific provision for her husband’s personal maintenance, which, “ although less than she could wish, and far less than he deserves, considering the eminent services he had rendered the state,” she settles at one half of all the net proceeds and profits accruing from the newly-discovered countries in the West ; together with 10,000,000 mrs. annually, assigned on the alcavalas of the grand-masterships of the military orders.

After some additional regulations, respecting the descent of the crown on failure of Joanna’s lineal heirs, she recommends in the kindest and most emphatic terms to her successors the various members of her household, and her personal friends, among whom we find the names of the Marquis and Marchioness of Moya, (Beatrice de Bobadilla, the companion of her youth,) and Garcilasso de la Vega, the accomplished minister to the papal court.

And lastly, concluding in the same beautiful strain of conjugal tenderness in which she began, she says, "I beseech the king my lord, that he will accept all my jewels, or such as he shall select, so that seeing them he may be reminded of the singular love I always bore him, while living, and that I am now waiting for him in a better world; by which remembrance he may be encouraged to live the more justly and holily in this."

Six executors were named to the will. The two principal were the king and the primate Ximenes, who had full powers to act in conjunction with any one of the others.*

I have dwelt the more minutely on the details of Isabella's testament, from the evidence it affords of her constancy in her dying hour to the principles which had governed her through life; of her expansive and sagacious policy; her prophetic insight into the evils to result from her death—evils, alas! which no forecast could avert; her scrupulous attention to

* I have before me three copies of Isabella's testament; one in MS. ap. Carbajal, Anales, año 1504; a second printed in Montfort's beautiful edition of Mariana, tom. ix. Apend. No. 1; and a third published in Dormer's Discursos Varios de Historia, pp. 314—388. I am not aware that it has been printed elsewhere.

all her personal obligations ; and that warm attachment to her friends, which could never falter while a pulse beat in her bosom.

After performing this duty, she daily grew weaker, the powers of her mind seeming to brighten as those of her body declined. The concerns of her government still occupied her thoughts, and several public measures, which she had postponed through urgency of other business, or growing infirmities, pressed so heavily on her heart, that she made them the subject of a codicil to her former will. It was executed November 23rd, 1504, only three days before her death.

Three of the provisions contained in it are too remarkable to pass unnoticed. The first concerns the codification of the laws. For this purpose, the queen appoints a commission to make a new digest of the statutes and pragmáticas, the contradictory tenor of which still occasioned much embarrassment in Castilian jurisprudence. This was a subject she always had much at heart ; but no nearer approach had been made to it than the valuable though insufficient work of Montalvo in the early part of her reign ; and, notwithstanding her precautions, none more effectual was destined to take place till the reign of Philip II.*

The second item had reference to the natives of

* The Ordenanças Reales de Montalvo, published 1484, and the Pragmáticas de Ramirez, first printed 1503, comprehend the general legislation of this reign ; a particular account of which the reader may find in P. i. chap. vi. and P. ii. ch. xxvi. of this History.

the New World. Gross abuses had arisen there since the partial revival of the repartimientos, although Las Casas says, "intelligence of this was carefully kept from the ears of the queen."* Some vague apprehension of the truth, however, appears to have forced itself on her ; and she enjoins her successors, in the most earnest manner, to quicken the good work of converting and civilizing the poor Indians, to treat them with the greatest gentleness, and redress any wrongs they may have suffered in their persons or property.

Lastly, she expresses her doubts as to the legality of the revenue drawn from the alcavalas, constituting the principal income of the crown. She directs a commission to ascertain whether it were originally intended to be perpetual, and if this were done with the free consent of the people ; enjoining her heirs, in that event, to collect the tax so that it should press least heavily on her subjects. Should it be found otherwise, however, she directs that the legislature be summoned to devise proper measures for cesse, parcequ'elle ne cessait de recommander de traiter les Indiens avec douceur, et de ne rien négliger pour les rendre heureux : j'ai vu, ainsi que beaucoup d'Espagnols, les lettres qu'elle écrivait à ce sujet, et les ordres qu'elle envoyait ; ce qui prouve que cette admirable reine aurait mis fin à tant de cruautés si elle avait pu les connaître." Œuvres, trad. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 21.

* Las Casas, who will not be suspected of sycophancy, remarks, in his narrative of the destruction of the Indies, " Les plus grandes horreurs de ces guerres et de cette boucherie commencèrent aussitôt qu'on sut en Amérique que la reine Isabelle venait de mourir ; car jusqu' alors il ne s'était pas commis autant de crimes dans l'île Espagnole, et l'on avait même eu soin de les cacher à cette prin-

supplying the wants of the crown, — “ measures depending for their validity on the good pleasure of the subjects of the realm.”*

Such were the dying words of this admirable woman, displaying the same respect for the rights and liberties of the nation which she had shown through life, and striving to secure the blessings of her benign administration to the most distant and barbarous regions under her sway. These two documents were a precious legacy bequeathed to her people, to guide them when the light of her personal example should be withdrawn for ever.

The queen's signature to the codicil, which still exists among the manuscripts of the royal library at Madrid, shows, by its irregular and scarcely legible characters, the feeble state to which she was then reduced.† She had now adjusted all her worldly concerns, and she prepared to devote herself, during the brief space which remained, to those of a higher nature. It was but the last act of a life of preparation. She had the misfortune, common to persons of her rank, to be separated in her last moments from those whose filial tenderness might have done so much to soften the bitterness of death. But she had the good fortune, most rare, to have secured for this trying hour the solace of disinterested friendship; for she beheld around her the friends of her childhood, formed and proved in the dark season of adversity.

* The original codicil is still preserved among the MSS. of the royal library at Madrid. It is appended to the queen's testament in the works before noticed.

† Clemencin has given a facsimile of this last signature of the queen in the Mem. de Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Il xxi.

As she saw them bathed in tears around her bed, she calmly said, “Do not weep for me, nor waste your time in fruitless prayers for my recovery, but pray rather for the salvation of my soul.”* On receiving the extreme unction, she refused to have her feet exposed, as was usual on that occasion; a circumstance which, occurring at a time when there can be no suspicion of affectation, is often noticed by Spanish writers as a proof of that sensitive delicacy and decorum which distinguished her through life.† At length, having received the sacraments, and performed all the offices of a sincere and devout Christian, she gently expired a little before noon, on Wednesday, November 26th, 1504, in the fifty-fourth year of her age, and thirtieth of her reign.‡

“My hand,” says Peter Martyr, in a letter written on the same day to the Archbishop of Granada, “falls powerless by my side, for very sorrow. The world has lost its noblest ornament; a loss to be deplored not only by Spain, which she has so long carried forward in the career of glory, but by every nation in Christendom; for she was the mirror of every virtue, the shield of the innocent, and an avenging sword to the wicked. I know none of her

* L. M. Siculo, Cosas Memor. fol. 187. — Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xvi.

† Arevalo, Istor. Palentina, MS. ap. Mem. de Ac. de Hist.

tom. vi. p. 572. — L. M. Siculo, fol. 187. — Garibay, ubi sup.

‡ Isabella was born April 22nd, 1451, and ascended the throne, Dec. 12th, 1474.

sex, in ancient or modern times, who in my judgment is at all worthy to be named with this incomparable lady.”*

No time was lost in making preparations for transporting the queen's body unenballed to Granada, in strict conformity to her orders. It was escorted by a numerous train of cavaliers and ecclesiastics, among whom was the faithful Martyr. The procession began its mournful march the day following her death, taking the route through Arevalo, Toledo, and Jaen. Scarcely had it left Medina del Campo, when a tremendous tempest set in, which continued with little interruption during the whole journey. The roads were rendered nearly impassable; the bridges swept away, the small streams swollen to the size of the Tagus, and the level country buried under a deluge of water. Neither sun nor stars were seen during their whole progress. The horses and mules were borne down by the torrents, and the riders in several instances perished with them. “Never,” exclaims Martyr, “did I encounter such perils in the whole of my hazardous pilgrimage to Egypt.”†

At length, on the 18th of December, the melancholy and wayworn cavalcade reached the place of its destination; and amidst the wild strife of the elements the peaceful remains of Isabella were laid, with simple solemnities, in the Franciscan monastery of the Alhambra. Here, under the shadow does not exaggerate the language of the epistle.

* Opus Epist. ep. cclxxix.

† Ibid. ep. cclxxx.—The text

of those venerable Moslêm towers, and in the midst of the capital, which her noble constancy covered for her country, they continued to rest after the death of Ferdinand, when they were removed to be laid by his side in the stately sepulchrum of the cathedral church of Granada.*

I shall defer the review of Queen Isabella's administration, until it can be done in conjunction with that of Ferdinand; and shall confine the present to the consideration of such prominent features of her character as have been suggested by the preceding history of her life.

Her person, as mentioned in the early part of the narrative, was of the middle height, and well proportioned. She had a clear, fresh complexion, light blue eyes and auburn hair,—a style of dress exceedingly rare in Spain. Her features were regular, and universally allowed to be uncommonly handsome.† The illusion which attaches to more especially when united with engaging manners, might lead us to suspect some exaggeration in the encomiums so liberally lavished on her. But they would seem to be in a great measure justified by the portraits that remain of her, which combine a faultless symmetry of features with singular sweetness and intelligence of expression.

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. cci. —Carbajal, MS. año 1504.—Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xix. cap. xvi.—Zurita, tom. v. lib. v. cap. lxxxiv.—Navagiero, Viaggio in Spagna, fol. 23.

† The Curate de los Palacios remarks of her, "Fue muger hermosa, de muy gentil cuerpo, e gesto, e composicion." (Cap. cci.) Pulgar, another contemporary, eulogizes "el mirar muy graciosa, y honesto, las facciones del rostro bien puestas, la cara toda muy hermosa." (Cronica de los Reyes Cat. P. . cap. iv.)

L. M. Siculo says, "Tanto se hallava en el rey de diuina hermosura, y en ella se mostrava una majestad, aunque a juyzio de la reyna era de mayor." (Cosas Memorables de Oviedo, who has frequent opportunities of observation, does not hesitate to declare, "En las mugeres que yo vi tan graciosas de ver como su persona cuagenas, MS.

Her manners were most gracious and pleasing. They were marked by a natural dignity and a modest reserve, tempered by an affability which flowed from the kindness of her disposition. She was the last person to be approached with undue familiarity; yet the respect which she imposed was mingled with the strongest feelings of devotion and love. She showed great tact in accommodating herself to the peculiar situation and character of those around her. She appeared in arms at the head of her troops, and shrunk from none of the hardships of war. During the reforms introduced into the religious houses, she visited the nunneries in person, taking her needlework with her, and passing the day in the society of the inmates. When travelling in Galicia, she attired herself in the costume of the country, borrowing for that purpose the jewels and other ornaments of the ladies there, and returning them with liberal additions.* By this condescending and captivating deportment, as well as by her higher qualities, she gained an ascendancy over her turbulent subjects which no King of Spain could ever boast.

* Mem. de la R. Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. viii.

She spoke the Castilian with much elegance and correctness. She had an easy fluency of discourse, which, though generally of a serious complexion, was occasionally seasoned with agreeable sallies, some of which have passed into proverbs.* She was temperate even to abstemiousness in her diet, seldom or never tasting wine;† and so frugal in her table, that the daily expenses for herself and family did not exceed the moderate sum of forty ducats.‡ She was equally simple and economical in her apparel. On all public occasions, indeed, she displayed a royal magnificence;§ but she had no relish for it in private, and she freely gave away her clothes|| and jewels,‡ as presents to her friends. Naturally of a sedate, though cheerful temper, she had little taste

* Mem. de Acad. ubi supra.

† L. Marinæo Siculo, fol. 182.
—Pulgar, Cronica de los Reyes, P. i. cap. iv.

‡ Mem. de Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. p. 323.

§ Such occasions have rare charms, of course, for the gossiping chroniclers of the period. See, among others, the gorgeous ceremonial of the baptism and presentation of Prince John at Seville, 1478, as related by the good curate de los Palacios, (cap. xxxii. xxxiii. MS.) “Isabella was surrounded and served,” says Pulgar, “by grandees and lords of the highest rank, so that it was said she maintained too great pomp—pompa demasiada.”
—Cronica de los Reyes, P. i. cap. iv.

|| Florez quotes a passage from an original letter of the queen, written soon after one of her progresses into Galicia, showing her habitual liberality in this way. “Decid a Doña Luisa, que porque vengo de Galicia desecha de vestidos, no le envio para su hermana; que no tengo agora cosa buena; mas yo ge los enviare presto buenos.”
Reynas Catol. tom. ii. p. 839.

‡ See the magnificent inventory of jewels presented to her daughter-in-law Margaret of Austria, and to her daughter Maria, Queen of Portugal, ap. Mem. de Acad. tom. vi. Ilust. xii.

 “Alegre,” says the author of the Carro de las Doñas, “de

for the frivolous amusements which make up so much of a court life ; and, if she encouraged the presence of minstrels and musicians in her palace, it was to wean her young nobility from the coarser and less intellectual pleasures to which they were addicted.*

Among her moral qualities, the most conspicuous, perhaps, was her magnanimity. She betrayed nothing little or selfish in thought or action. Her schemes were vast, and executed in the same noble spirit in which they were conceived. She never employed doubtful agents or sinister measures, but the most direct and open policy.† She scorned to avail herself of advantages offered by the perfidy of others.‡ Where she had once given her confidence, she gave her hearty and steady support ; and she was scrupulous to redeem any pledge she had made to those who ventured in her cause, however unpopular. She sustained Ximenes in all his obnoxious but salutary reforms. She seconded Columbus in the prosecution of his arduous enterprise, and shielded him from the calumny of his enemies. She did the same good service to her favourite Gonsalvo de Cordova ; and the day of her death was felt, and, as it una alegria honesta y mui mesurada." Ibid. p. 558.

* Among the retainers of the court, Bernaldez notices "la moltitud de poetas, de trovadores, e musicos de todas partes." Cap. cci. MS.

† "Quería que sus cartas é mandamientos fuesen cumplidos con diligencia." — Pulgar, Cronica, P. i. cap. iv.

‡ See a remarkable instance of this in her treatment of the faithless Juan de Corral noticed in Part i. chap. x. of this History.

proved, truly felt by both, as the last of their good fortune.* Artifice and duplicity were so abhorrent to her character, and so averse from her domestic policy, that when they appear in the foreign relations of Spain it is certainly not imputable to her. She was incapable of harbouring a petty distrust or latent malice; and, although stern in the execution and exactions of public justice, made the most generous allowance, and even sometimes advances, to those who had personally injured her.†

But the principle which gave a peculiar colouring to every feature of Isabella's mind was piety. It shone forth from the very depths of her soul with a heavenly radiance which illuminated her whole character. Fortunately, her earliest years had been passed in the rugged school of adversity, under the eye of a mother who implanted in her serious mind such strong principles of religion as nothing in after life had power to shake. At an early age, in the flower

* The melancholy tone of Columbus's correspondence after the queen's death shows too well the colour of his fortunes and feelings. (Navarrete, tom. i. p. 341, et seq.) The sentiments of the Great Captain were still more unequivocally expressed, according to Giovio. "Nec multis inde diebus Regina fato concessit, incredibili cum dolore atque jacturâ Gonsalvi; nam ab eâ tanquam alumnus, ac in ejus regiâ educatus, cuncta quæ exoptari possent virtutis et dignitatis incrementa ademptum fuisse fatebatur, rege ipso quanquam minus benigno parumque liberali nunquam reginæ voluntati reluctari auso. Id verò præclare tanquam verissimum apparuit elatâ reginâ." Vitæ Ill. Virorum, p. 275.

† The reader may recall a striking example of this, in the early part of her reign, in her great tenderness and forbearance towards the humours of Carillo, Archbishop of Toledo, her quondam friend, but then her most implacable foe.

of youth and beauty, she was introduced to her brother's court; but its blandishments, so dazzling to a young imagination, had no power over hers; for she was surrounded by a moral atmosphere of purity,

“ Driving far off each thing of sin and guilt.”*

Such was the decorum of her manners, that, though encompassed by false friends and open enemies, not the slightest reproach was breathed on her fair name in this corrupt and calumnious court.

She gave a liberal portion of her time to private devotions, as well as to the public exercises of religion.† She expended large sums in useful charities,

* Isabella at her brother's court might well have sat for the whole of Milton's beautiful portraiture.

“ So dear to Heaven is saintly chastity,
That when a soul is found sincerely so,
A thousand liveried angels lackey her,
Driving far off each thing of sin and guilt,
And in clear dream and solemn vision,
Tell her of things that no gross ear can hear,
Till oft converse with heav'nly habitants
Begins to cast a beam on th' outward shape,
The unpolluted temple of the mind,
And turns it by degrees to the soul's essence,
Till all be made immortal.”

† “ Era tanto,” says L. M. Siculo, “ el ardor y diligencia que tenia cerca el culto divino, que aunque de dia y de noche estava muy ocupada en grandes y arduos negocios de la governacion de muchos reynos y señorios parecia que su vida era mas contemplativa que activa. Porque siempre se hallava presente a los divinos oficios y a la palabra de Dios. Era tanta su atencion que si alguno de los que celebravan o cantavan los psalmos, o otras cosas de la yglesia errava alguna dicion o syllaba, lo sintia y lo notava, y despues como maestro a discipulo se lo emendava y corregia. Acostumbrava cada dia dezir todas las horas canonicas demas de otras muchas votivas y extraordinarias devociones que tenia.” Cosas Memorables, fol. 183.

especially in the erection of hospitals and churches, and the more doubtful endowments of monasteries.* Her piety was strikingly exhibited in that unfeigned humility which, although the very essence of our faith, is so rarely found; and most rarely in those whose great powers and exalted stations seem to raise them above the level of ordinary mortals. A remarkable illustration of this is afforded in the queen's correspondence with Talavera, in which her meek and docile spirit is strikingly contrasted with the puritanical intolerance of her confessor.† Yet Talavera, as we have seen, was sincere, and benevolent at heart. Unfortunately, the royal conscience was at times committed to very different keeping; and that humility which, as we have repeatedly had occasion to notice, made her defer so reverentially to her ghostly advisers, led under the fanatic Torquemada, the confessor of her early youth, to those deep blemishes on her administration, the establishment of the Inquisition, and the exile of the Jews.

But, though blemishes of the deepest dye on her administration, they are certainly not to be regarded as such on her moral character. It will be difficult

* Pulgar, Cronica, P. i. cap. iv.—Lucio Marinæo enumerates many of these splendid charities. (Fol. 165.) See also the notices scattered over the Itinerary (Viaggio in Spagna) of Navigiero, who travelled through the country a few years after.

† The archbishop's letters are little better than a homily on the sins of dancing, feasting, dressing, and the like, garnished with Scriptural allusions, and conveyed in a tone of sour rebuke, that would have done credit to the most canting Roundhead in Oliver Cromwell's court. The queen, far from taking exception at it, vindicates herself from the grave imputations with a degree of to condemn her, indeed, without condemning the age; for these very acts are not only excused, but extolled, by her contemporaries, as constituting her strongest claims to renown, and to the gratitude of her country.* They proceeded from the principle openly avowed by the court of Rome, that zeal for the purity of the faith could atone for every crime. This immoral maxim, flowing from the head of the church, was echoed in a thousand different forms by the subordinate clergy, and greedily received by a superstitious people.† It was not to be expected, that a solitary woman, filled with natural diffidence of her own capacity on such subjects, should array herself against those venerated counsellors whom she had been taught from her cradle to look to as the guides and guardians of her conscience.

However mischievous the operations of the Inquisition may have been in Spain, its establishment, earnestness and simplicity, which may provoke a smile in the reader. "I am aware," she concludes, "that custom cannot make an action, bad in itself, good; but I wish your opinion, whether, under all the circumstances, these can be considered bad; that, if so, they may be discontinued in future." See this curious correspondence in Mem. de Acad. tom. vi. Ilust. xiii.

* Such encomiums become still more striking in writers of such sound and expansive views as Zurita and Blancas, who, although flourishing in a better instructed age, do not scruple to pronounce the Inquisition "the greatest evidence of her prudence and piety, whose uncommon utility not only Spain, but all Christendom freely acknowledged!" Blancæ Commentarii, p. 263.—Zurita, Anal. tom. v. lib. i. cap. vi.

† Sismondi displays the mischievous influence of these theological dogmas, in Italy as well as Spain, under the pontificate of Alexander VI. and his immediate predecessors, in chap. xc. of his eloquent and philosophical 'Histoire des Républiques Italiennes.' in point of principle, was not worse than many other measures, which have passed with far less censure, though in a much more advanced and civilised age.* Where, indeed, during the sixteenth, and the greater part of the seventeenth century, was the principle of persecution abandoned by the dominant party, whether Catholic or Protestant? And where that of toleration asserted, except by the weaker? It is true, to borrow Isabella's own expression, in her letter to Talavera, the prevalence of a bad custom cannot constitute its apology: but it should serve much to mitigate our condemnation of the queen, that she fell into no greater error, in the imperfect light in which she lived, than was common to the greatest minds in a later and far riper period.†

Isabella's actions, indeed, were habitually based

* I borrow almost the words of Mr. Hallam, who, noticing the penal statutes against Catholics under Elizabeth, says, "They established a persecution which fell not at all short in principle of that for which the Inquisition had become so odious." (Constitutional History of England, vol. i. ch. iii.) Even Lord Burleigh, commenting on the mode of examination adopted in certain cases by the High Commission court, does not hesitate to say the interrogatories were "so curiously penned, so full of branches and circumstances, as he thought the inquisitors of Spain used not so many questions to comprehend and to trap their preys." Ibid. chap. iv.

† Even Milton, in his essay on the "Liberty of unlicensed printing," the most splendid argument, perhaps, the world had then witnessed in behalf of intellectual liberty, would exclude popery from the benefits of toleration, as a religion which the public good required at all events to be extirpated. Such were the crude views of the rights of conscience entertained, in the latter half of the seventeenth century, by one of those gifted minds whose extraordinary elevation enabled it to catch and reflect back the coming light of knowledge, long before it had fallen on the rest of mankind.

on principle. Whatever errors of judgment be imputed to her, she most anxiously sought in all situations to discern and discharge her duty. Faithful in the dispensation of justice, no bribe was large enough to ward off the execution of the law.* No motive, not even conjugal affection, could induce her to make an unsuitable appointment to public office.† No reverence for the ministers of religion could lead her to wink at their misconduct;‡ nor could the deference she entertained for the head of the church allow her to tolerate his encroachments on the rights of her crown.§ She seemed to consider herself especially bound to preserve entire the peculiar claims and privileges of Castile, after its union under the same sovereign with Aragon.|| And although, “ while

* The most remarkable example of this, perhaps, occurred in the case of the wealthy Galician knight, Yañez de Lugo, who endeavoured to purchase a pardon of the queen by the enormous bribe of 40,000 doblas of gold. The attempt failed, though warmly supported by some of the royal counsellors. The story is well vouched. Pulgar, Cron. de los Reyes Cat. P. ii. cap. xcvi.—L. M. Siculo, fol. 180.

† The reader may recollect a pertinent illustration of this on the occasion of Ximenes's appointment to the primacy. Part ii. ch. v. of this History.

‡ See, among other instances, her exemplary chastisement of the ecclesiastics of Truxillo. Part i. chap. xii. of this History.

§ Ibid. Part i. ch. vi. Part ii. ch. x. et alibi. Indeed, this independent attitude was shown, as I have more than once had occasion to notice, not merely in shielding the rights of her own crown, but in the boldest remonstrances against the corrupt practices and personal immorality of those who filled the chair of St. Peter at this period.

|| The public acts of this reign afford repeated evidence of the pertinacity with which Isabella insisted on reserving the benefits of the Moorish conquests and the American discoveries for her own subjects of Castile, by whom and for whom they had been mainly achieved. The same thing is reiterated in the most emphatic manner in her testament.

her own will was law," says Peter Martyr, "she governed in such a manner that it might appear the joint action of both Ferdinand and herself," yet she was careful never to surrender into his hands one of those prerogatives which belonged to her as queen proprietor of the kingdom.*

Isabella's measures were characterised by that practical good sense, without which the most brilliant parts may work more to the woe than the weal of mankind. Though engaged all her life in reforms, she had none of the failings so common in reformers. Her plans, though vast, were never visionary. The best proof of this is, that she lived to see most of them realized.

She was quick to discern objects of real utility. She saw the importance of the new discovery of printing, and liberally patronised it, from the first moment it appeared.† She had none of the exclusive local prejudices, too common with her countrymen. She drew talent from the most remote quarters to her dominions, by munificent rewards. She imported foreign artisans for her manufactures; foreign engineers and officers for the discipline of her army; and foreign scholars to imbue her martial subjects with more cultivated tastes. She consulted the useful in all her subordinate regulations; in her sumptuary laws, for instance, directed against the fashionable extravagancies of dress, and the ruinous ostentation, so much affected by the Castilians in their weddings and funerals.* Lastly, she showed the same perspicacity in the selection of her agents ; well knowing that the best measures become bad in incompetent hands.

* Opus Epist. ep. xxxi.

† Mem. de Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. p. 49.

But although the skilful selection of her agents was an obvious cause of Isabella's success, yet another, even more important, is to be found in her own vigilance and untiring exertions. During the first busy and bustling years of her reign, these exertions were of incredible magnitude. She was almost always in the saddle, for she made all her journeys on horseback ; and she travelled with a rapidity which made her always present on the spot where her presence was needed. She was never intimidated by the weather, or the state of her own health, and this reckless exposure undoubtedly contributed much to impair her excellent constitution.†

* The preamble of one of her pragmaticas against this lavish expenditure at funerals, contains some reflections worth quoting for the evidence they afford of her practical good sense. “ Nos deseando proveer e remediar al tal gasto sin provecho, e considerando que esto no redundo en sufragio e alivio de las animas de los defuntos,” &c. . . . “ Pero los catolicos Cristianos que creemos que hai otra vida despues desta, donde las animas esperan folganza e vida perdurable, desta habemos de curar e procurar de la ganar por obras meritorias, e no por cosas transitorias e vanas como son los lutos e gastos excesivos.” Ibid. p. 318.

† Her exposure in this way on one occasion brought on a miscarriage. According to Gomez, indeed, she finally died of an ulcer, occasioned by her long and laborious journeys. “ Putridum et verecundum ulcus, quod ex assiduis ad Granatam equitationibus contraxisse aiunt, mortiferè serpebat.” (De Reb. Gestis Ximen. fol. 47.) Giovio adopts the same account. (Vitæ Illust. Virorum, p. 275.) The authorities are good, certainly ; but Martyr, who was in the palace, with every opportunity for correct information, and with

She was equally indefatigable in her mental application. After assiduous attention to business through the day, she was often known to sit up all night, dictating despatches to her secretaries.* In the midst of these overwhelming cares, she found time to supply the defects of early education by learning Latin, so as to understand it without difficulty, whether written or spoken; and indeed, in the opinion of a competent judge, to attain a critical accuracy in it.† As she had little turn for light amusements, she sought relief from graver cares by some useful occupation appropriate to her sex; and she left ample evidence of her skill in this way in the rich specimens of embroidery, wrought with her own fair hands, with which she decorated the churches. She was careful to instruct her daughters in these more humble departments of domestic duty; for she thought nothing too humble to learn, which was useful.‡

With all her high qualifications, Isabella would no reason for concealment of the truth in his private correspondence with Tendilla and Talavera, makes no allusion whatever to such a complaint in his circumstantial account of the queen's illness.

* Ferreras, tom. vii. p. 411. — Mem. de Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. p. 29.

† L. M. Siculo, Cosas Mem. fol. 182. — "Pronunciaba con primor el Latin, y era tan habil en la prosodia, que si erraban algun acento, luego le corregia." Ibid. ap. Florez, Reynas Catol. tom. ii. p. 834.

‡ If we are to believe Florez, the king wore no shirt but of the queen's making. "Preciabase de no haverse puesto su marido camisa, que elle no huviesse hilado y cosido." (Tom. iii. p. 832.) If this be taken literally, his wardrobe, considering the multitude of her avocations, must have been indifferently furnished.

have been still unequal to the achievement of her grand designs, without possessing a degree of fortitude rare in either sex ; not the courage which implies contempt of personal danger,—though of this she had a larger share than falls to most men ; * nor that which supports its possessor under the extremities of bodily pain,—though of this she gave ample evidence, since she endured the greatest suffering her sex is called to bear, without a groan ; † but that moral courage which sustains the spirit in the dark hour of adversity, and, gathering light from within to dispel the darkness, imparts its own cheering influence to all around. This was shown remarkably in the stormy season which ushered in her accession, as well as through the whole of the Moorish war. It was her voice that decided never to abandon Alhama.‡ Her remonstrances compelled the king and nobles to return to the field, when they had quitted it after an ineffectual campaign. As dangers and difficulties multiplied, she multiplied resources to

* Among many evidences of this, what other need be given than her conduct at the famous riot at Segovia ? Part i. chap. vi. of this History.

† Pulgar, Cronica, P. i. cap. iv.—“No fue la Reyna,” says Marinæo Siculo, “de animo menos fuerte para sufrir los dolores corporales. Porque como yo fuy informado de las dueñas que le servian en la camara, ni en los dolores que padescia de sus enfermedades, ni en los del parto (que es cosa de grande admiracion) nunca la vieron quejar se ; antes con increyble y maravillosa fortaleza los suffria y dissimulava.” (Cosas Memor. fol. 186.) To the same effect writes the anonymous author of the Carro de las Doñas, ap. Mem. de Acad. tom. vi. p. 559.

‡ “Era firme en sus propósitos, de los quales se retraia con gran dificultad.” Pulgar, Cronica, P. i. cap. iv.

meet them; and when her soldiers lay drooping under the evils of some long protracted siege, she appeared in the midst, mounted on her war-horse, with her delicate limbs cased in knightly mail,* and, riding through their ranks, breathed new courage into their hearts by her own intrepid bearing. To her personal efforts, indeed, as well as counsels, the success of this glorious war may be mainly imputed; and the unsuspicious testimony of the Venetian minister, Navagiero, a few years later, shows that the nation so considered it. "Queen Isabel," says he, "by her singular genius, masculine strength of mind, and other virtues, most unusual in our own sex, as well as hers, was not merely of great assistance in, but the chief cause of, the conquest of Granada. She was, indeed, a most rare and virtuous lady, one of whom the Spaniards talk far more than of the king, sagacious as he was, and uncommon for his time." †

Happily these masculine qualities in Isabella did not extinguish the softer ones which constitute the charm of her sex. Her heart overflowed with affectionate sensibility to her family and friends. She

* The reader may refresh his recollection of Tasso's graceful sketch of Erminia in similar warlike panoply.

"Col durissimo acciar preme
ed offende

Il delicato collo e l'aurea chioma;

E la tenera man lo scudo
prende

Pur troppo grave e insorportabil soma.

Così tutta di ferro intor-splende,

E in atto militar se stes-doma."

Gerusalemme Liberata, c. vi.
st. 92.

† Viaggio in Spagna, fol. 27.

watched over the declining days of her aged mother, and ministered to her sad infirmities with all the delicacy of filial tenderness.* We have seen abundant proofs how fondly and faithfully she loved her husband to the last,† though this love was not always as faithfully requited.‡ For her children she lived more than for herself; and for them too she died, for it was their loss and their afflictions which froze the current of her blood, before age had time to chill it.

* We find one of the first articles in the marriage treaty with Ferdinand enjoining him to cherish and treat her mother with all reverence, and to provide suitably for her royal maintenance. (Mem. de la R. Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Apend. No. 1.) The author of the Carro de las Doñas thus notices her tender devotedness to her parent, at a later period. “Y esto me dijo quien lo vido por sus propios ojos, que la Reyna Doña Isabel, nuestra señora, quando estaba alli en Arevalo visitando a su madre, ella misma por su persona servia a su misma madre. E aqui tomen exemplo los hijos como han de servir a sus padres, pues una Reina tan poderosa y en negocios tan arduos puesta, todos los mas de los años (puesto todo aparte y pospuesto) iba a visitar a su madre y la servia humilmente.” Ibid. p. 557.

† Among other little tokens of mutual affection, it may be mentioned that not only the public coin, but their furniture, books, and other articles of personal property, were stamped with their initials, F and I, or emblazoned with their devices, his being a yoke, and hers a sheaf of arrows. (Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 2, dial. 3.) It was common, says Oviedo, for each party to take a device, whose initial corresponded with that of the name of the other; as was the case here, with jugo and flechas.

‡ Marinao thus speaks of the queen's discreet and most amiable conduct in these delicate matters. “Amava en tanta manera al Rey su marido, que andava sobre aviso con celos a ver si el amava a otras. Y si sentia que mirava a alguna dama o donzella de su casa con señal de amores, con mucha prudencia buscava medios y maneras con que despedir aquella tal persona de su casa, con su mucha honrra y provecho.” (Cosas Memor. fol. 182.) There was unfortunately too much cause for this uneasiness. See Part ii. ch. xxiv. of this History.

Her exalted state did not remove her above the sympathies of friendship.* With her friends she forgot the usual distinctions of rank, sharing in their joys, visiting and consoling them in sorrow and sickness, and condescending, in more than one instance, to assume the office of executrix on their decease.† Her heart, indeed, was filled with benevolence to all mankind. In the most fiery heat of war she was engaged in devising means for mitigating its horrors. She is said to have been the first to introduce the benevolent institution of camp hospitals; and we have seen, more than once, her lively solicitude to spare the effusion of blood even of her enemies. But it is needless to multiply examples of this beautiful but familiar trait in her character.‡

* The best beloved of her friends, probably, was the Marchioness of Moya, who, seldom separated from her royal mistress through life, had the melancholy satisfaction of closing her eyes in death. Oviedo, who saw them frequently together, says that the queen never addressed this lady, even in later life, with any other than the endearing title of hija marquesa, daughter marchioness. Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 1, dial. 23.

† As was the case with Cardenas, the comendador mayor, and the Grand Cardinal Mendoza, to whom, as we have already seen, she paid the kindest attentions during their last illness. While in this way she indulged the natural dictates of her heart, she was careful to render every outward mark of respect to the memory of those whose rank or services entitled them to such consideration. “Quando,” says the author so often quoted, “quiera que fallezca alguno de los grandes de su reyno, o algun principe Christiano, luego embiavan varones sabios y religiosos para consolar a sus heredores y deudos. Y demas desto se vestian de ropas de luto en testimonio del dolor y sentimiento que hazian.” L. M. Siculo, fol. 185.

‡ Her humanity was shown in her attempts to mitigate the ferocious character of those national amusements, the bull-fights, whose popularity throughout the country was too great as she intimates in one of her letters, to admit of her abolish-

It is in these more amiable qualities of her sex, that Isabella's superiority becomes most apparent over her illustrious namesake, Elizabeth of England,* whose history presents some features parallel to her own. Both were disciplined in early life by the teachings of that stern nurse of wisdom, adversity; both were made to experience the deepest humiliation at the hands of their nearest relative, who should have cherished and protected them; both succeeded in establishing themselves on the throne after the most precarious vicissitudes. Each conducted her respective kingdom, through a long and triumphant reign, to a height of glory which it never before reached. Both lived to see the vanity of all earthly grandeur, and to fall the victims of an inconsolable melancholy; and both left behind an illustrious name, unrivalled in the subsequent annals of their country.

But with these few circumstances of their history the resemblance ceases. Their characters afford scarcely a point of contact. Elizabeth, inheriting a large share of the bold and bluff King Harry's temperament, was haughty, arrogant, coarse, and irascible; while with these fiercer qualities she mingled ing them altogether. She was so much moved at the sanguinary issue of one of these combats, which she witnessed at Arevalo, says a contemporary, that she devised a plan, by guarding the horns of the bulls, for preventing any serious injury to the men and horses; and she never would attend another of these spectacles until this precaution had been adopted. Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS.

* Isabel, the name of the Catholic queen, is correctly rendered into English by that of Elizabeth.

deep dissimulation, and strange irresolution. Isabella, on the other hand, tempered the dignity of royal station with the most bland and courteous manners. Once resolved, she was constant in her purposes ; and her conduct in public and private life was characterized by candour and integrity. Both may be said to have shown that magnanimity which is implied by the accomplishment of great objects in the face of great obstacles. But Elizabeth was desperately selfish ; she was incapable of forgiving, not merely a real injury, but the slightest affront to her vanity ; and she was merciless in exacting retribution. Isabella, on the other hand, lived only for others,—was ready at all times to sacrifice self to considerations of public duty ; and, so far from personal resentments, showed the greatest condescension and kindness to those who had most sensibly injured her ; while her benevolent heart sought every means to mitigate the authorized severities of the law, even towards the guilty.*

Both possessed rare fortitude. Isabella, indeed, was placed in situations which demanded more frequent and higher displays of it than her rival ; but no one will doubt a full measure of this quality in

* She gave evidence of this in the commutation of the sentence she obtained for the wretch who stabbed her husband, and whom her ferocious nobles would have put to death, without the opportunity of confession and absolution, that “ his soul might perish with his body !” (See her letter to Talavera.) She showed this merciful temper, so rare in that rough age, by dispensing altogether with the preliminary barbarities sometimes prescribed by the law in capital executions. Mem. de la R. Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. xiii.

the daughter of Henry VIII. Elizabeth was better educated, and every way more highly accomplished, than Isabella : but the latter knew enough to maintain her station with dignity ; and she encouraged learning by a munificent patronage.* The masculine powers and passions of Elizabeth seemed to divorce her in a great measure from the peculiar attributes of her sex, at least from those which constitute its peculiar charm ; for she had abundance of its foibles,—a coquetry and love of admiration which age could not chill ; a levity, most careless, if not criminal ;† and a fondness for dress and tawdry magnificence of ornament, which was ridiculous, or disgusting, according to the different periods of life in which it was indulged.‡ Isabella, on the other hand, dis-

* Hume admits, that, “ unhappily for literature, at least for the learned of this age, Queen Elizabeth’s vanity lay more in shining by her own learning, than in encouraging men of genius by her liberality.”

† Which of the two, the reader of the records of these times may be somewhat puzzled to determine.—If one need be convinced how many faces history can wear, and how difficult it is to get at the true one, he has only to compare Dr. Lingard’s account of this reign with Mr. Turner’s. Much obliquity was to be expected, indeed, from the avowed apologist of a persecuted party, like the former writer. But it attaches, I fear, to the latter in more than one instance,—as in the reign of

Richard III. for example. Does it proceed from the desire of saying something new on a beaten topic, where the new cannot always be true ? Or, as is most probable, from that confiding benevolence, which throws somewhat of its own light over the darkest shades of human character ? The unprejudiced reader may perhaps agree, that the balance of this great queen’s good and bad qualities is held with a more steady and impartial hand by Mr. Hallam than any preceding writer.

‡ The unsuspecting testimony of her godson Harrington places these foibles in the most ludicrous light. If the well-known story, repeated by Carte, of the three thousand dresses left in her wardrobe at her decease, be tinguished through life for decorum of manners, and purity beyond the breath of calumny, was content with the legitimate affections which she could inspire within the range of her domestic circle. Far from a frivolous affectation of ornament or dress, she was most simple in her own attire, and seemed to set no value on her jewels, but as they could serve the necessities of the state ;* when they could be no longer useful in this way, she gave them away, as we have seen, to her friends.

Both were uncommonly sagacious in the selection of their ministers ; though Elizabeth was drawn into some errors in this particular by her levity,† as was Isabella by religious feeling. It was this, combined with her excessive humility, which led to the only grave errors in the administration of the latter. Her rival fell into no such errors ; and she was a stranger to the amiable qualities which led to them. Her conduct was certainly not controlled by religious principle ; and, though the bulwark of the Protestant faith, it might be difficult to say whether she were at heart most a Protestant or a Catholic. She viewed the whole in its connexion with the state ; in other true, or near truth, it affords a singular contrast with Isabella's taste in these matters.

* The reader will remember how effectually they answered this purpose in the Moorish war. See Part i. chap. xiv. of this History.

† It is scarcely necessary to mention the names of Hatton and Leicester, both recommended to the first offices in the state chiefly by their personal attractions, and the latter of whom continued to maintain the highest place in his sovereign's favour for thirty years or more, in despite of his total destitution of all moral worth.

words, with herself : and she took measures for enforcing conformity to her own views, not a whit less despotic, and scarcely less sanguinary, than those countenanced for conscience' sake by her more bigoted rival.*

This feature of bigotry, which has thrown a shade over Isabella's otherwise beautiful character, might lead to a disparagement of her intellectual power compared with that of the English queen. To estimate this aright, we must contemplate the results of their respective reigns. Elizabeth found all the materials of prosperity at hand, and availed herself of them to build up a solid fabric of national grandeur. Isabella created these materials. She saw the faculties of her people locked up in a death-like lethargy, and she breathed into them the breath of life for those great and heroic enterprises which terminated in such glorious consequences to the monarchy. It is when viewed from the depressed position of her early days, that the achievements of her reign seem scarcely less than miraculous. The masculine genius of the English queen stands out relieved beyond its

* Queen Elizabeth, indeed, in a declaration to her people, proclaims, "We know not, nor have any meaning to allow, that any of our subjects should be molested, either by examination or inquisition, in any matter of faith, as long as they shall profess the Christian faith." (Turner's Elizabeth, vol. ii. p. 241, note.) One is reminded of Parson

Thwackum's definition in Tom Jones : "When I mention religion, I mean the Christian religion ; and not only the Christian religion, but the Protestant religion ; and not only the Protestant religion, but the Church of England." It would be difficult to say which fared worst, Puritans or Catholics, under this system of toleration.

natural dimensions by its separation from the other qualities of her sex ; while her rival's, like some vast but symmetrical edifice, loses in appearance somewhat of its actual grandeur from the perfect harmony of its proportions.

The circumstances of their deaths, which were somewhat similar, displayed the great dissimilarity of their characters. Both pined amidst their royal state, a prey to incurable despondency, rather than any marked bodily distemper. In Elizabeth's sprung from wounded vanity, a sullen conviction that she had outlived the admiration on which she had so long fed, — and even the solace of friendship and the attachment of her subjects. Nor did she seek consolation, where alone it was to be found, in this sad hour. Isabella, on the other hand, still under a too acute sensibility to the sufferings of others. But, amidst the gloom which gathered around her, she looked with the eye of faith to the brighter prospects which unfolded of the future ; and when she resigned her last breath, it was amidst the tears and universal lamentations of her people.

It is in this undying, unabated attachment of the nation, indeed, that we see the most unequivocal testimony to the virtues of Isabella. In the downward progress of things in Spain, some of the most ill-advised measures of her administration have found favour and been perpetuated, while the more salutary have been forgotten. This may lead to a misconception of her real merits. In order to estimate these, we must listen to the voice of her contemporaries, the eye-witnesses of the condition in which she found the state, and in which she left it. We shall then see but one judgment formed of her, whether by foreigners or natives. The French and Italian writers equally join in celebrating the triumphant glories of her reign, and her magnanimity, wisdom, and purity of character.* Her own subjects extol her as "the most brilliant exemplar of every virtue," and mourn over the day of her death as "the last of the prosperity and happiness of their country;"† while those who had nearer access to her person are unbounded in their admiration of those amiable qualities whose full power is revealed only in the unrestrained intimacies of domestic life.‡

* "Quum generosi," says Paolo Giovio, speaking of her, "prudentisque animi magnitudine, tum pudicitiae et pietatis laude antiquis heroidibus comparanda." (Vitæ Ill. Viror. p. 205.) Guicciardini eulogises her as "Donna di onestissimi costumi, e in concetto grandissimo nei Regni suoi di magnanimità e prudenza." (Ist. d'Ital. lib. vi.) The loyal serviteur notices her death in the following chivalrous strain: "L'an 1506, une des plus triumpantes et glorieuses dames qui puis mille ans ait été sur terre alla de vie à trespas: ce fut la royne, Ysabel de Castille, qui ayda, le bras armé, à conquerer le royaume de Grenade sur les Mores. Je veux bien asseurer aux lecteurs de ceste presente hystoire, que sa vie a esté telle, qu'elle a bien merité couronne de laurier apres sa mort." Mém. de Bayard, ch. xxvi.—See also Comines, chap. xxiii.—Navigiero, fol. 27.—et al. auct.

† I borrow the words of one contemporary; "Quo quidem die omnis Hispaniæ fœlicitas, omne decus, omnium virtutum pulcherrimum specimen interiit;" (L. M. Siculo, lib. xxi.)—and the sentiments of all.

‡ If the reader needs further testimony of this, he will find abundance collected by the indefatigable Clemencin, in the 21st Ilust. of the Mem. de la Real Acad. de Hist. tom. vi.

The judgment of posterity has ratified the sentence of her own age. The most enlightened Spaniards of the present day, by no means insensible to the errors of her government, but more capable of appreciating its merits than those of a less instructed age, bear honourable testimony to her deserts ; and, while they pass over the bloated magnificence of succeeding monarchs, who arrest the popular eye, dwell with enthusiasm on Isabella's character, as the most truly great in their line of princes.*

* It would be easy to cite the authority, over and over again, of such writers as Marina, Sempere, Llorente, Navarrete, Quintana, and others, who have done such honour to the literature of Spain in the present century. It will be sufficient, however, to advert to the remarkable tribute paid to Isabella's character by the Royal Spanish

Academy of History, who in 1805 appointed their late secretary, Clemencin, to deliver an eulogy on that illustrious theme ; and who raised a still nobler monument to her memory, by the publication, in 1821, of the various documents compiled by him for the illustration of her reign, as a separate volume of their valuable Memoirs.

CHAPTER XVII.

FERDINAND REGENT. — HIS SECOND MARRIAGE.—DISSENSIONS WITH PHILIP. — RESIGNATION OF THE REGENCY.

1504—1506.

THE death of Isabella gives a new complexion to our history, a principal object of which has been the illustration of her personal character and public administration. The latter part of the narrative, it is true, has been chiefly occupied with the foreign relations of Spain, in which her interference has been less obvious than in the domestic ; but still we have been made conscious of her presence and parental supervision, by the maintenance of order, and the general prosperity of the nation. Her death will make us more sensible of this influence, since it was the signal for disorders which even the genius and authority of Ferdinand were unable to suppress.

While the queen's remains were yet scarcely cold, King Ferdinand took the usual measures for announcing the succession. He resigned the crown of Castile, which he had worn with so much glory for thirty years. From a scaffold raised in the great square of Toledo, the heralds proclaimed, by sound of trumpet, the accession of Philip and Joanna to the Castilian throne, and the royal standard was unfurled by the Duke of Alva, in honour of the illustrious pair. The King of Aragon then publicly assumed the title of administrator or governor of Castile, as provided by the queen's testament, and received the obeisance of such of the nobles as were present, in his new capacity. These proceedings took place on the evening of the same day on which the queen expired.*

A circular was next addressed to the principal cities, requiring them, after the customary celebration of the obsequies of their late sovereign, to raise the royal banners in the name of Joanna; and writs were immediately issued in her name, without mention of Philip's, for the convocation of a cortes to ratify these proceedings.†

The assembly met at Toro, January 11th, 1505. The queen's will, or rather such clauses of it as related to the succession, were read aloud, and received the entire approbation of the commons, who,

* Alvar. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximenii, fol. 52. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxxix. — Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xx. cap. i. — Galindez de Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1504. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 9.

“Sapientiæ alii,” says Martyr, in allusion to these prompt proceedings, “et summæ bonitatis adscribunt; alii rem novam admirati, regem incusant, remque arguunt, non debuisse fieri.” Ubi supra.

† Philip's name was omitted, as being a foreigner, until he should have taken the customary oath to respect the laws of the realm, and especially to confer office on none but native Castilians. Zurita, Anal. tom. v. lib. v. cap. lxxxiv.

together with the grandees and prelates present; took the oaths of allegiance to Joanna as queen and lady proprietor, and to Philip as her husband. They then determined that the exigency contemplated in the testament, of Joanna's incapacity, actually existed,* and proceeded to tender their homage to King Ferdinand, as the lawful governor of the realm in her name. The latter in turn made the customary oath to respect the laws and liberties of the kingdom; and the whole was terminated by an embassy from the cortes, with a written account of its proceedings, to their new sovereigns in Flanders.†

All seemed now done that was demanded for giving a constitutional sanction to Ferdinand's authority as regent. By the written law of the land, the sovereign was empowered to nominate a regency in case of the minority or incapacity of the heir-apparent.‡ This had been done in the present instance by Isabella, and at the earnest solicitation of cortes, made two years previous to her death. It had received the cordial approbation of that body, which had undeniable authority to control such testament-

* The maternal tenderness and delicacy, which had led Isabella to allude to her daughter's minority only in very general terms, are well remarked by Zurita. See the copy of the original act in Zurita, tom. vi. lib. iv.

Albarca, Reyes de Arag. i. R. xxx. cap. xv. sec. ii. Zurita, Anal. tom. vi. lib. vi. — Marina, Teoría de las Cortes, P. ii. cap. iv.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. c. xii.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 9.

‡ Siete Partidas, P. ii. tit. xv. ley iii.

Guicciardini, with the ignorance of the Spanish constitution natural enough in a foreigner, disputes the queen's right to make any such settlement. Istoria d'Italia, lib. vii.

ary provisions.* Thus, from the first to the last stage of the proceeding, the whole had gone on with scrupulous attention to constitutional forms: yet the authority of the new regent was far from being firmly seated, and it was the conviction of this which had led him to accelerate measures.

Many of the nobles were extremely dissatisfied with the queen's settlement of the regency, which had taken air before her death; and they had even gone so far as to send to Flanders before that event, and invite Philip to assume the government himself, as the natural guardian of his wife.† These discontented lords, if they did not refuse to join in the public acts of acknowledgment to Ferdinand at Toro, at least were not reserved in intimating their dissatisfaction.‡ Among the most prominent were the Marquis de Villena, who may be said to have been nursed to faction from the cradle, and the Duke de Najara, both potent nobles, whose broad domains had been grievously clipped by the resumption of the crown lands so scrupulously enforced by the late government, and who looked forward to their speedy recovery under the careless rule of a young, inexperienced prince like Philip.§

* See the whole subject of the powers of cortes in this particular, as discussed very fully and satisfactorily by Marina, Teoría, P. ii. cap. xiii.

† Bernaldez, Hist. de los Reyes Catol. MS. cap. cciii.—Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xv. sec. iii.—P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxxiv. cclxxvii.

‡ Zurita's assertion, that all the nobility present did homage to Ferdinand, (tom. vi. cap. iii.) would seem to be contradicted by a subsequent passage. Cf. cap. iv.

§ Isabella in her will particularly enjoins on her successors never to alienate or restore the crown lands recovered from the

But the most efficient of his partisans was Don Juan Manuel, Ferdinand's ambassador at the court of Maximilian. This nobleman, descended from one of the most illustrious houses in Castile, was a person of uncommon parts; restless and intriguing, plausible in his address, bold in his plans, but exceedingly cautious, and even cunning, in the execution of them. He had formerly insinuated himself into Philip's confidence during his visit to Spain, and, on receiving news of the queen's death, hastened without delay to join him in the Netherlands.

Through his means, an extensive correspondence was soon opened with the discontented Castilian lords, and Philip was persuaded, not only to assert his pretensions to undivided supremacy in Castile, but to send a letter to his royal father-in-law, requiring him to resign the government at once, and retire into Aragon.* The demand was treated with Marquisate of Villena. — Dormer, Discursos Varios de Hist. p. 331.

* “Nor was it sufficient,” says Dr. Robertson, in allusion to Philip's pretensions to the government, “to oppose to these just rights, and to the inclination of the people of Castile, the authority of a testament, the genuineness of which was perhaps doubtful, and its contents to him appeared certainly to be iniquitous.” (Hist. of Charles V. vol. ii. p. 7.) But who ever intimated a doubt of its genuineness, before Dr. Robertson? Certainly no one living at that time, for the will was produced before cortes, by the royal secretary, in the session immediately following the queen's death; and Zurita has preserved the address of that body, commenting on the part of its contents relating to the succession. (Anales, tom. vi. cap. iv.) Dr. Carbajal, a member of the royal council, and who was present, as he expressly declares, at the approval of the testament, “a cuyo otorgamiento y aun ordenacion me hallé,” has transcribed the whole of the document in his Annals, with the signatures of the notary and the seven distinguished some contempt by Ferdinand, who admonished him of his incompetency to govern a nation like the Spaniards, whom he understood so little, but urged him at the same time to present himself before them with his wife, as soon as possible.*

Ferdinand's situation, however, was far from comfortable. Philip's, or rather Manuel's emissaries were busily stirring up the embers of disaffection. They dwelt on the advantages to be gained from the free and lavish disposition of Philip, which they contrasted with the parsimonious temper of the stern old Catalan, who had so long held them under his yoke.† Ferdinand, whose policy had been to crush the overgrown power of the nobility, and who, as a foreigner, had none of the natural claims to loyalty enjoyed by his late queen, was extremely odious to that jealous and haughty body. The number of Philip's adherents increased in it every day, and soon comprehended the most considerable names in the kingdom.

persons who witnessed its execution. Dormer, the national historiographer of Aragon, has published the instrument, with the same minuteness, in his 'Discursos Varios,' "from authentic MSS. in his possession,"—"escrituras autenticas en mi poder." Where the original is now to be found, or whether it be in existence, I have no knowledge. The codicil, as we have seen, with the queen's signature, is still extant in the royal library at Madrid.

* P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxxxii.—Zurita, Anal. de Arag. tom. vi. lib. vi. c. i.—Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Xim. fol. 53.—Mariana, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. c. xii.

† "Existimantes," says Giovio, "sub florentissimo juvene rege aliquanto liberius atque licentius ipsorum potentiâ fructuros quàm sub austero et parùm liberali, ut aiebant, sene Catalano." Vitæ Illust. Viror. p. 277.

The king, who watched these symptoms of disaffection with deep anxiety, said little, says Martyr; but coolly scrutinized the minds of those around him, dissembling as far as possible his own sentiments.* He received further and more unequivocal evidence, at this time, of the alienation of his son-in-law. An Aragonese gentleman named Conchillos, whom he had placed near the person of his daughter, obtained a letter from her, in which she approved in the fullest manner of her father's retaining the administration of the kingdom. The letter was betrayed to Philip; the unfortunate secretary was seized and thrown into a dungeon, and Joanna was placed under a rigorous confinement, which much aggravated her malady.†

With this affront, the king received also the alarming intelligence that the Emperor Maximilian and his son Philip were tampering with the fidelity of the Great Captain; endeavouring to secure Naples in any event to the archduke, who claimed it as the appurtenance of Castile, by whose armies its conquest, in fact, had been achieved. There were not wanting persons of high standing at Ferdinand's court, to infuse suspicions, however unwarrantable, into the royal mind, of the loyalty of his viceroy, a

* "Rex, quæcunque versant atque ordiuntur, sentit, dissimulat, et animos omnium tacitus scrutatur." Ep. cclxxxix.

† Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xv. s. iv. — Lanuza, Hist.

Eccles. y Secul. tom. i. lib. i. c. xviii.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cclxxxvi. — Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. c. viii. — Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 9.—Oviedo had the story from Conchillos's brother.

Castilian by birth, and who owed his elevation exclusively to the queen.*

The king was still further annoyed by reports of the intimate relations subsisting between his old enemy Louis XII. and Philip, whose children were affianced to each other. The French monarch, it was said, was prepared to support his ally in an invasion of Castile, for the recovery of his rights, by a diversion in his favour on the side of Roussillon, as well as of Naples.†

The Catholic king felt himself sorely perplexed by these multiplied embarrassments. During the brief period of his regency, he had endeavoured to recommend himself to the people by a strict and impartial administration of the laws, and the maintenance of public order. The people, indeed, appreciated the value of a government under which they had been protected from the oppressions of the aristocracy more effectually than at any former period. They had testified their good will by the alacrity with which they confirmed Isabella's testamentary dispositions at Toro: but all this served only to sharpen the aversion of the nobles. Some of Ferdinand's counsellors would have persuaded him to carry measures with a higher hand. They urged him to re-assume the title of King of Castile, which he had so long possessed as husband of the late

* P. Jovii Vitæ Illustr. Vir. pp. 275—277. — Zurita, Anal. tom. vi. lib. vi. c. v. xi. — Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V, fol. 25. — Ab-

arca, tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xv. sec. iii.

† P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccxc. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 94.

queen ; * and others even advised him to assemble an armed force, which should overawe all opposition to his authority at home, and secure the country from invasion. He had facilities for this in the disbanded levies lately returned from Italy, as well as a considerable body drawn from his native dominions of Aragon, waiting his orders on the frontier. † Such violent measures, however, were repugnant to his habitual policy, temperate and cautious. He shrunk from a contest in which even success must bring unspeakable calamities on the country ; ‡ and if he ever seriously entertained such views, § he abandoned them, and employed his levies on another destination in Africa. || His situation, however, grew every

* The vice-chancellor Alonso de la Caballeria prepared an elaborate argument in support of Ferdinand's pretensions to the regal authority and title, less as husband of the late queen than as the lawful guardian and administrator of his daughter. See Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. cap. xiv.

† Zurita, Anal. tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. v. xv. — Lanuza, Hist. tom. i. lib. i. cap. xviii.

‡ Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccxci.

§ Robertson speaks with confidence of Ferdinand's intention to "oppose Philip's landing by force of arms," (Charles V. vol. ii. p. 13,) an imputation which has brought a heavy judgment on the historian's head from the clever author of the History of Spain. (Cabinet Cyclopædia.)

"All this," says the latter, "is at variance with both truth and probability ; nor does Ferreras, the only authority cited for this unjust declamation, afford the slightest ground for it." (Vol. ii. p. 286, note.) Nevertheless, this is so stated by Ferreras, (tom. viii. p. 282,) who is supported by Mariana, (tom. ii. lib. xxviii. c. xvi.) and, in the most unequivocal manner, by Zurita, (tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. xxi.) a much higher authority than either. Martyr, it is true, whom Dr. Dunham does not appear to have consulted on this occasion, declares that the king had no design of resorting to force. See epist. ccxci. cccv.

|| Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccii. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1505.

hour more critical; alarmed by rumours of Louis's military preparations, for which liberal supplies were voted by the states-general; trembling for the fate of his Italian possessions, deserted and betrayed by the great nobility at home, there seemed now no alternative left, but to maintain his ground by force, or resign it at once, as required by Philip, and retire into Aragon. This last course appears never to have been contemplated by him. He resolved at all hazards to keep the reins in his own grasp, influenced in part, probably, by the consciousness of his rights, as well as by a sense of duty, which forbade him to resign the trust he had voluntarily assumed into such incompetent hands as those of Philip and his counsellors; and partly, no doubt, by natural reluctance to relinquish the authority which he had enjoyed for so many years. To keep it, he had recourse to an expedient, such as neither friend nor foe could have anticipated.

He saw the only chance of maintaining his present position lay in detaching France from the interests of Philip, and securing her to himself. The great obstacle to this was their conflicting claims on Naples. This he purposed to obviate by proposals of marriage to some member of the royal family, in whose favour these claims, with the consent of King Louis, might be resigned. He accordingly despatched a confidential envoy privately into France, with ample instructions for arranging the preliminaries. This person was Juan de Enguera, a Catalan monk of much repute for his learning, and a member of the royal council.*

Louis XII. had viewed with much satisfaction the growing misunderstanding betwixt Philip and his father-in-law, and had cunningly used his influence over the young prince to foment it. He felt the deepest disquietude at the prospect of the enormous inheritance which was to devolve on the latter, comprehending Burgundy and Flanders, Austria, and probably the empire, together with the united crowns of Spain and their rich dependencies. By the pro-

* Before venturing on this step, it was currently reported, that Ferdinand had offered his hand, though unsuccessfully, to Joanna, Beltraneja, Isabella's unfortunate competitor for the crown of Castile, who still survived in Portugal. (Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. xiv. — Mariana, tom. iii. lib. xxviii. c. xiii. — et al.) The report originated, doubtless, in the malice of the Castilian nobles, who wished in this way to discredit the king still more with the people. It received, perhaps, some degree of credit from a silly story in circulation, of a testament of Henry IV. having lately come into Ferdinand's possession, avowing Joanna to be his legitimate daughter. See Carbajal, (Anales, MS. año 1474,) the only authority for this last rumour.

Robertson has given an incautious credence to the first story, which has brought Dr. Dunham's iron flail somewhat unmercifully on his shoulders again; yet his easy faith in the matter may find some palliation, at least sufficient to screen him from the charge of wilful mis-statement, in the fact that Clemencin, a native historian and a most patient and fair inquirer after truth, has come to the same conclusion. (Mem. de la Real Acad. de Hist, tom. vi. Ilust. xix.) Both writers rely on the authority of Sandoval, an historian of the latter half of the sixteenth century, whose naked assertion cannot be permitted to counterbalance the strong testimony afforded by the silence of contemporaries and the general discredit of succeeding writers. (Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. x.)

Sismondi, not content with this first offer of King Ferdinand, makes him afterwards propose for a daughter of King Emanuel, or, in other words, his own granddaughter! Hist. des Français, tom. xv. chap. xxx.

posed marriage, a dismemberment might be made at least of the Spanish monarchy; and the kingdoms of Castile and Aragon, passing under different sceptres, might serve, as they had formerly done, to neutralize each other. It was true, this would involve a rupture with Philip, to whose son his own daughter was promised in marriage. But this match, extremely distasteful to his subjects, gradually became so to Louis, as every way prejudicial to the interests of France.*

Without much delay, therefore, preliminaries were arranged with the Aragonese envoy, and immediately after, in the month of August 1505, the Count de Cifuentes, and Thomas Malferit, regent of the royal chancery, were publicly sent as plenipotentiaries on the part of King Ferdinand, to conclude and execute the treaty.

It was agreed, as the basis of the alliance, that the Catholic king should be married to Germaine, daughter of Jean de Foix, Viscount of Narbonne, and of one of the sisters of Louis XII, and grand-daughter to Leonora, Queen of Navarre,—that guilty sister of King Ferdinand, whose fate is recorded in the earlier part of our history. The Princess Germaine, it will be seen, therefore, was nearly related to both the contracting parties. She was at this time eighteen years of age and very beautiful.† She had been tom. v. lib. xxxv. c. vii. s. iv. — Alv. Gomecius, fol. 56. — Salazar de Mendoza, Monarq. de España, tom. i. p. 410.

* Mém. de Fleurange, chap. xv. — Claude Seyssel, Hist. de Louis XII. pp. 223—229.

† Aleson, Hist. de Navar.

“ Laquelle

educated in the palace of her royal uncle, where she had imbibed the free and volatile manners of his gay, luxurious court. To this lady Louis XII. consented to resign his claims on Naples, to be secured by way of dowry to her and her heirs, male or female, in perpetuity. In case of her decease without issue, the moiety of the kingdom recognised as his by the partition treaty with Spain was to revert to him. It was further agreed that Ferdinand should reimburse Louis XII. for the expenses of the Neapolitan war, by the payment of 1,000,000 gold ducats, in ten yearly instalments ; and, lastly, that a complete amnesty should be granted by him to the lords of the Angevin, or French party in Naples, who should receive full restitution of their confiscated honours and estates. A mutual treaty of alliance and commerce was to subsist henceforth between France and Spain ; and the two monarchs, holding one another, to quote the words of the instrument, “ as two souls in one and the same body,” pledged themselves to the maintenance and defence of their respective rights and kingdoms against every other power whatever. This treaty was signed by the French king at Blois, October 12th, 1505, and ratified by Ferdinand the Catholic, at Segovia, on the 16th of the same month.*

“ Laquelle,” says Fleurange, who had doubtless often seen the princess, “ était bonne et fort belle princesse, du moins elle n’avoit point perdu son embonpoint.” (Mémoires, chap. xix.) It would be strange if she had, at the age of eighteen. Varillas gets over the discrepancy of age between the parties very well, by making Ferdinand’s at this time only thirty-seven years ! Hist. de Louis XII. tom. i. p. 457.

* Dumont, Corps Diplomat. tom. iv. No. 40. pp. 72—74.

Such were the disgraceful and most impolitic terms of this compact, by which Ferdinand, in order to secure the brief possession of a barren authority, and perhaps to gratify some unworthy feelings of revenge, was content to barter away all those solid advantages, flowing from the union of the Spanish monarchies, which had been the great and wise object of his own and Isabella's policy! For, in the event of male issue,—and that he should have issue was by no means improbable, considering he was not yet fifty-four years of age,—Aragon and its dependencies must be totally severed from Castile.* In the other alternative, the splendid Italian conquests, which after such cost of toil and treasure he had finally secured to himself, must be shared with his unsuccessful competitor. In any event, he had pledged himself to such an indemnification of the Angevin faction in Naples, as must create inextricable embarrassment, and inflict great injury on his loyal partisans, into whose hands their estates had already passed. And last, though not least, he dishonoured, by this unsuitable and precipitate alliance, his late illustrious queen, the memory of whose transcendent excellence, if it had faded in any degree from his own breast, was too deeply seated in those of her subjects to allow them to look on the present union otherwise than as a national indignity.

* These dependencies did not embrace, however, the half of Granada and the West Indies, as supposed by Mons. Gaillard, who gravely assures us, that “Les états conquis par Ferdinand étoient conquêtes de com- munauté, dont la moitié appartenait au mari, et la moitié aux enfans.” (Rival. de France et d’Esp. tom. iv. p. 306.) Such are the gross misconceptions of fact, on which this writer’s speculations rest!

So, indeed, they did regard it; although the people of Aragon, in whom late events had rekindled their ancient jealousy of Castile, viewed the match with more complacency, as likely to restore them to that political importance which had been somewhat impaired by the union with their more powerful neighbour.*

The European nations could not comprehend an arrangement so irreconcilable with the usual sagacious policy of the Catholic king. The petty Italian powers, who, since the introduction of France and Spain into their political system, were controlled by them more or less in all their movements, viewed this sinister conjunction as auspicious of no good to their interests or independence. As for the Archduke Philip, he could scarcely credit the possibility of this desperate act, which struck off at a blow so rich a portion of his inheritance. He soon received confirmation, however, of its truth, by a prohibition from Louis XII. to attempt a passage through his dominions into Spain, until he should come to some amicable understanding with his father-in-law.†

* Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. xix. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. xvi.

† Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. c. xv. s. viii. — Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. xxi. — Guicciardini, lster. lib. vii.

He received much more unequivocal intimation in a letter from Ferdinand, curious as showing that the latter sensibly felt the nature and extent of the sacrifices he was making. "You," says he to Philip, "by lending yourself to be the easy dupe of France, have driven me most Philip, or rather Manuel, who exercised unbounded influence over his counsels, saw the necessity now of temporizing. The correspondence was resumed with Ferdinand, and an arrangement was at length concluded between the parties, known as the concord of Salamanca, Nov. 24th, 1505. The substance of it was, that Castile should be governed in the joint names of Ferdinand, Philip, and Joanna; but that the former should be entitled, as his share, to one-half of the public revenue. This treaty, executed in good faith by the Catholic king, was only intended by Philip to lull the suspicions of the former until he could effect a landing in the kingdom, where he confidently believed nothing but his presence was wanting to insure success. He completed the perfidious proceeding by sending an epistle, well garnished with soft and honied phrase, to his royal father-in-law. These artifices had their effect, and completely imposed, not only on Louis, but on the more shrewd and suspicious Ferdinand.*

reluctantly into a second marriage; have stripped me of the fair fruits of my Neapolitan conquests," &c. &c. He concludes with this appeal to him. "Sit satis, fili, pervagatum; redi in te, si filius, non hostis accesseris, his non obstantibus, mi fili, us amplexabere. Magna est paternæ vis naturæ." Philip may have thought his father-in-law's late conduct an indifferent commentary on the "vis naturæ." See the king's letter, quoted by Peter Martyr in his correspondence with the Count de Tendilla. Ep. ccxciii.

* Carbajal, Anal. MS. año 1506.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. xxiii.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. c. xvi.—P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccxcii. — Zurita has transcribed the whole of this dutiful and most loving epistle (Loc. cit.)

Guicciardini considers Philip as only practising the lessons had learned in Spain, "le

On the 8th of January 1506, Philip and Joanna embarked on board a splendid and numerous armada, and set sail from a port in Zealand. A furious tempest scattered the fleet soon after leaving harbour; Philip's ship, which took fire in the storm, narrowly escaped foundering; and it was not without great difficulty that they succeeded in bringing her, a miserable wreck, into the English port of Weymouth.* King Henry VII, on learning the misfortunes of Philip and his consort, was prompt to show every mark of respect and consideration for the royal pair, thus thrown upon his island. They were escorted in magnificent style to Windsor, and detained with dubious hospitality for nearly three months. During this time, Henry VII. availed himself of the situation and inexperience of his young guest, so far as to extort from him two treaties, not altogether reconcilable, as far as the latter was concerned, with sound policy or honour.† The respect which the English monarch entertained for Ferdinand the Catholic, as Spagnuole." (Istoria, lib. vii.) The phrase would seem to have been proverbial with the Italians, like the 'Punica fides,' which their Roman ancestors fastened on the character of their African enemy;—perhaps with equal justice.

* Joanna, according to Sandoval, displayed much composure in her alarming situation. When informed by Philip of their danger, she attired herself in her richest dress, securing a considerable sum of money to her person, that her body, if found, might be recognised, and receive the obsequies suited to her rank. Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 10.

† Bernaldez, MS. cap. cciv. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1506. — St. Gelais, p. 186. — Bacon, Hist. of Henry VII. Works, vol. v. pp. 177 — 179. — Guicciardini, lib. vii. — Rymer, Fœdera, tom. xiii. pp. 123 — 132. One well as their family connexion, led him to offer his services as a common mediator between the father and son. He would have persuaded the latter, says Lord Bacon, "to be ruled by the counsel of a prince, so prudent, so experienced, and so fortunate as King Ferdinand;" to which the archduke replied, "If his father-in-law would let him govern Castile, he should govern him."*

At length, Philip, having reassembled his Flemish fleet at Weymouth, embarked with Joanna and his numerous suite of courtiers and military retainers, and reached Coruña, in the north-western corner of Galicia, after a prosperous voyage, on the 28th of April.

A short time previous to this event, the Conde de Cifuentes having passed into France for the purpose, the betrothed bride of King Ferdinand quitted that country under his escort, attended by a brilliant retinue of French and Neapolitan lords.† On the borders, at Fontarabia, she was received by the Archbishop of Saragossa, Ferdinand's natural son, with a numerous retinue, composed chiefly of Aragonese and Catalan nobility, and conducted with much solemnity to Dueñas, where she was joined by the king. In this place, where thirty years before he had been

One was a commercial treaty with Flanders, so disastrous as to be known in that country by the name of 'malus intercursus'; the other involved the surrender of the unfortunate Duke of Suffolk.

* Lord Bacon, Hist. of Henry VII. vol. v. p. 179.

† Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 2, dial. 36.—Mém. de Bayard, ch. xxvi.

united to Isabella, he now, (March 18th, 1506,) as if to embitter still further the recollections of the past, led to the altar her young and beautiful successor. "It seemed hard," says Martyr, in his quiet way, "that these nuptials should take place so soon, and that too in Isabella's own kingdom of Castile, where she had lived without peer, and where her ashes are still held in as much veneration as she enjoyed while living."*

It was less than six weeks after this, that Philip and Joanna landed at Coruña. Ferdinand, who had expected them in some nearer northern port, prepared without loss of time to go forward and receive them. He sent on an express to arrange the place of meeting with Philip, and advanced himself as far as Leon. But Philip had no intention of such an interview at present. He had purposely landed in a remote corner of the country, in order to gain time for his partisans to come forward and declare themselves. Missives had been despatched to the principal nobles and cavaliers, and they were answered by great numbers of all ranks, who pressed forward to

* Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccc.—Quincuagenas de Gonzalo Hernandez de Oviedo, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 2, dial. 36.—Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1506. — Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. cciii.

"Some affirmed," says Zurita, "that Isabella, before appointing her husband to the regency, exacted an oath from him that he would not marry a second time." (Anal. tom. v. lib. v. c. lxxxiv.) This improbable story, so inconsistent with the queen's character, has been transcribed with more or less qualification by succeeding historians from Mariana to Quintana. Robertson repeats it without any qualification at all: See History of Charles V. vol. ii. p. 6.

welcome and pay court to the young monarch.* Among them were the names of most of the considerable Castilian families ; and several, as Villena and Najara, were accompanied by large, well-appointed retinues of armed followers. The archduke brought over with him a body of 3000 German infantry in complete order. He soon mustered an additional force of 6000 native Spaniards, which, with the chivalry who thronged to meet him, placed him in a condition to dictate terms to his father-in-law ; and he now openly proclaimed that he had no intention of abiding by the concord of Salamanca, and that he would never consent to an arrangement prejudicing in any degree his and his wife's exclusive possession of the crown of Castile.†

It was in vain that Ferdinand endeavoured to gain Don John Manuel to his interests by the most liberal offers. He could offer nothing to compete with the absolute ascendancy which the favourite held over his young sovereign. It was in vain that Martyr, and afterwards Ximenes, were sent to the archduke, to settle the grounds of accommodation, or at least the place of interview with the king. Philip listened to them with courtesy, but would abate not a jot

* "Quisque enim in spes suas pronus et expeditus commodo serviendum," says Giovio, borrowing the familiar metaphor, "et orientem solem potius quam occidentem adorandum esse dictabat." Vitæ Illust. Vir. p. 278.

† Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap.

xxix. xxx. — Gomecius, De Rebus Gest. Ximen. fol. 57. — Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. cciv. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cciv. ccv. — Galindez de Carbajal, MS. año 1506. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 10.

of his pretensions; and Manuel did not care to expose his royal master to the influence of Ferdinand's superior address and sagacity in a personal interview.*

Martyr gives a picture, by no means unfavourable, of Philip at this time. He had an agreeable person, a generous disposition, free and open manners, with a certain nobleness of soul, although spurred on by a most craving ambition; but he was so ignorant of affairs, that he became the dupe of artful men, who played on him for their own purposes.†

Ferdinand, at length, finding that Philip, who had now left Coruña, was advancing by a circuitous route into the interior, on purpose to avoid him, and that all access to his daughter was absolutely refused, could no longer repress his indignation, and he prepared a circular, to be sent to the different parts of the country, calling on it to rise and aid him in rescuing the queen their sovereign from her present shameful captivity.‡ It does not appear that he sent it. He probably found that the call would not be answered; for the French match had lost him even that degree

* P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccvi. cccviii. cccix.—Alv. Gomecius, fol. 59. — P. Jovius, Vitæ Ill. Viror. p. 278.

† “ Nil benignius Philippo in terris, nullus inter orbis principes animosior, inter juvenes pulchrior,” &c. (Epist. cclxxxv.) In a subsequent letter he thus describes the unhappy predicament of the young prince; “ Nescit hic juvenis, nescit quò se vertat, hinc avaris, illinc ambitiosis, atque utrimque vafriis hominibus circumseptus alienigena, bonæ naturæ, apertique animi. Trahetur in diversa, perturbabitur ipse atque obtundetur. Omnia confundentur. Utinam vana prædicem!” Epist. cccviii.

‡ Zurita, Anal. de Aragon, tom. vi. lib. vii. c. ii.

of favour with which he had been regarded by the commons; so the very expedient on which he relied for perpetuating his authority in Castile was the chief cause of his losing it altogether.

He was doomed to experience still more mortifying indignities. By the orders of the Marquis of Astorga and the Count of Benavente, he was actually refused admittance into those cities; while proclamation was made by the same arrogant lords, prohibiting any of their vassals from aiding or harbouring his Aragonese followers. "A sad spectacle, indeed," exclaims the loyal Martyr, "to behold a monarch, yesterday almost omnipotent, thus wandering a vagabond in his own kingdom, refused even the sight of his own child!" *

Of all the gay tribe of courtiers who fluttered around him in his prosperity, the only Castilians of note who now remained true, were the Duke of Alva and the Count of Cifuentes;† for even his son-in-law, the Constable of Castile, had deserted him. There were some, however, at a distance from the scene of operations, as the good Talavera, for instance, and the Count de Tendilla, who saw with much concern the prospect of changing the steady and well-tried hand, which had held the helm for

* Opus Epist. epist. cccviii.

"Ayer era Rey de España, oy no lo soy de una villa;
ayer villas y castillos,
oy ninguno posseyá ;
ayer tenia criados," &c.

The lament of King Roderic, in this fine old ballad, would seem hardly too extravagant in the mouth of his royal descendant.

† "Ipsæ amicos res optimæ pariunt, adversæ probant." —
Pub. Syrus.

more than thirty years, for the capricious guidance of Philip and his favourites.*

An end was at length put to this scandalous exhibition, and Manuel, whether from increased confidence in his own resources, or the fear of bringing public odium on himself, consented to trust his royal charge to the peril of an interview. The place selected was an open plain near Puebla de Senabria, on the borders of Leon and Galicia, June 23rd. But, even then, the precautions taken were of a kind truly ludicrous, considering the forlorn condition of King Ferdinand. The whole military apparatus of the archduke was put in motion, as if he expected to win the crown by battle. First came the well-appointed German spearmen, all in fighting order; then, the shining squadrons of the noble Castilian chivalry and their armed retainers; next followed the archduke, seated on his war-horse and encompassed by his body-guard; while the rear was closed by the long files of archers and light cavalry of the country.†

Ferdinand, on the other hand, came into the field attended by about two hundred nobles and gentlemen, chiefly Aragonese and Italians, riding on mules, and simply attired in the short black cloak and bon-

* Opus Epist. ep. cccvi. cccxi.—Robles, Vida del Card. Ximenes, p. 143. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. xix.—Lanuza, Hist. Eccles. y Secular. tom. i. lib. i. c. xix.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 10.

† The only pretext for all this pomp of war was the rumour that the king was levying a considerable force, and the Duke of Alba mustering his followers in Leon; — rumours willingly circulated, no doubt, if not a sheer device of the enemy.—Zurita, lib. vii. cap. ii.

net of the country, with no other weapon than the sword usually worn. The king trusted, says Zurita, to the majesty of his presence, and the reputation he had acquired by his long and able administration.

The Castilian nobles, brought into contact with Ferdinand, could not well avoid paying their obeisance to him. He received them in his usual gracious and affable manner, making remarks, the good humour of which was occasionally seasoned with something of a more pungent character. To the Duke of Najara, who was noted for being a vain-glorious person, and who came forward with a gallant retinue in all the panoply of war, he exclaimed, "So, duke, you are mindful as ever, I see, of the duties of a great captain!" Among others was Garcilasso de la Vega, Ferdinand's minister formerly at Rome. Like many of the Castilian lords, he wore armour under his dress, the better to guard against surprise. The king embracing him felt the mail beneath, and, tapping him familiarly on the shoulder, said, "I congratulate you, Garcilasso; you have grown wonderfully lusty since we last met." The desertion, however, of one who had received so many favours from him, touched him more nearly than all the rest.

As Philip drew near, it was observed he wore an anxious, embarrassed air, while his father-in-law maintained the same serene and cheerful aspect as usual. After exchanging salutations, the two monarchs alighted, and entered a small hermitage in the neighbourhood, attended only by Manuel and Archbishop Ximenes. They had no sooner entered, than the latter, addressing the favourite with an air of authority it was not easy to resist, told him, "It was not meet to intrude on the private concerns of their masters;" and, taking his arm, led him out of the apartment and coolly locked the door on him, saying at the same time, that "he would serve as porter." The conference led to no result. Philip was well schooled in his part, and remained, says Martyr, immovable as a rock.* There was so little mutual confidence between the parties, that the name of Joanna, whom Ferdinand desired so much to see, was not even mentioned during the interview.†

But, however reluctant Ferdinand might be to admit it, he was no longer in condition to stand upon terms; and, in addition to the entire loss of influence in Castile, he received such alarming accounts from Naples as made him determine on an immediate visit in person to that kingdom. He resolved, therefore, to bow his head to the present storm, in hopes that a brighter day was in reserve for him. He saw the jealousy hourly springing up between the Flemish and Castilian courtiers, and he probably anticipated such misrule as would afford an opening, perhaps with the good will of the nation, for him to resume the reins so unceremoniously snatched from his grasp.* At any rate, should force be necessary, he would be better able to employ it effectively, with the aid of his ally the French king, after he had adjusted the affairs of Naples.†

* "Durior Caucasæ rupe, patrum nihil auscultavit." Epist. cccx.

† Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 43.—Robles, Vida de Ximenes, pp.

146 — 149.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. c. xx.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. v.—Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximen. fol. 61, 62.—Abarca, tom. ii. R. xxx. c. xv.—Carbajal, Anal. MS. año 1506.—Bernaldez, Hist. MS. c. cciv.

Whatever considerations may have influenced the prudent monarch, he authorized the Archbishop of Toledo, who kept near the person of the archduke, to consent to an accommodation on the very grounds proposed by the latter. On the 27th of June, he signed and solemnly swore to an agreement, by which he surrendered the entire sovereignty of Castile to Philip and Joanna, reserving to himself only the Grand-masterships of the military orders, with the revenues secured by Isabella's testament.‡

On the following day, he executed another instrument of most singular import, in which, after avowing in unequivocal terms his daughter's incapacity, he engages to assist Philip in preventing any interference in her behalf, and to maintain him, as far as in his power, in the sole exclusive authority.§

* Lord Bacon remarks, in allusion to Philip's premature death, "There was an observation by the wisest of that court, that if he had lived, his father would have gained upon him in that sort, as he would have governed his councils and designs, if not his affections." (Hist. of Henry VII. Works, vol. v. p. 180.) The prediction must have been suggested by the general estimation of their respective characters; for the parties never met again after Ferdinand withdrew to Aragon.

† Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. viii.

‡ Cura de los Palacios, MS. c. cciv. — Carbajal, MS. año 1506. — Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. c. vii. — P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccx.

§ Zurita, tom. vi. l. vii. c. viii.

Before signing these papers, he privately made a protest, in the presence of several witnesses, that what he was about to do was not of his own free will, but from necessity, to extricate himself from his perilous situation, and shield the country from the impending evils of a civil war. He concluded with asserting that, so far from relinquishing his claims to the regency, it was his design to enforce them, as well as to rescue his daughter from her captivity, as soon as he was in a condition to do so.* Finally, he completed this chain of inconsistencies by addressing a circular, July 1st, to the different parts of the kingdom, announcing his resignation of the government into the hands of Philip and Joanna, and declaring the act one which, notwithstanding his own right and power to the contrary, he had previously determined on executing, so soon as his children should set foot in Spain.†

It is not easy to reconcile this monstrous tissue of incongruity and dissimulation with any motives of

* Zurita, ubi supra.

† Ibidem, ubi sup.

Ferdinand's manifesto, as well as the instrument declaring his daughter's incapacity, are given at length by Zurita. The secret protest rests on the unsupported authority of the historian; and surely a better authority cannot easily be found, considering his proximity to the period, his resources as national historiographer, and the extreme caution and candour with which he discriminates between fact and rumour. It is very remarkable, however, that Peter Martyr, with every opportunity for information, as a member of the royal household, apparently high in the king's confidence, should have made no allusion to this secret protest in his correspondence with Tenedilla and Talavera, both attached to the royal party, and to whom he appears to have communicated all matters of interest without reserve.

necessity or expediency. Why should he, so soon after preparing to raise the kingdom in his daughter's cause, thus publicly avow her imbecility, and deposit the whole authority in the hands of Philip? Was it to bring odium on the head of the latter, by encouraging him to a measure which he knew must disgust the Castilians? * But Ferdinand by this very act shared the responsibility with him. Was it in the expectation that uncontrolled and undivided power, in the hands of one so rash and improvident, would the more speedily work his ruin? As to his clandestine protest, its design was obviously to afford a plausible pretext, at some future time, for reasserting his claims to the government, on the ground that his concessions had been the result of force. But then, why neutralize the operation of this by the declaration, spontaneously made in his manifesto to the people, that his abdication was not only a free, but most deliberate and premeditated act? He was led to this last avowal, probably, by the desire of covering over the mortification of his defeat; a thin varnish which could impose on nobody. The whole proceedings are of so ambiguous a character as to suggest the inevitable inference, that they flowed from habits of dissimulation too strong to be controlled, even when there was no occasion for its exercise. We occasionally meet with examples of a similar fondness for superfluous manœuvring in the humbler concerns of private life.

* This motive is charitably imputed to him by Gaillard. (Riv. de France et d'Esp. tom. iv. p. 311.) The same writer commends Ferdinand's habilité, in extricating himself from his embarrassments by the treaty, "auquel il fit consentir Philippe dans leur entrevue!" p. 310.

After these events, one more interview took place (July 5th,) between King Ferdinand and Philip, in which the former prevailed on his son-in-law to pay such attention to decorum, and exhibit such outward marks of a cordial reconciliation, as, if they did not altogether impose on the public, might at least throw a decent veil over the coming separation. Even at this last meeting, however, such was the distrust and apprehension entertained of him, that the unhappy father was not permitted to see and embrace his daughter before his departure.*

Throughout the whole of these trying scenes, says his biographer, the king maintained that propriety and entire self-possession which comported with the dignity of his station and character, and afforded a striking contrast to the conduct of his enemies. However much he may have been touched with the desertion of a people who had enjoyed the blessings of peace and security under his government for more than thirty years, he manifested no outward sign of discontent. On the contrary, he took leave of the assembled grandees with many expressions of regard, noticing kindly their past services to him, and studying to leave such an impression as should efface the recollection of recent differences.* The circumspect monarch looked forward, no doubt, to the day of his return. The event did not seem very improbable; and there were other sagacious persons besides himself, who read, in the dark signs of the times, abundant augury of some speedy revolution.†

* Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cius, fol. 64. — Pet. Martyr, cap. x. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. Opus Epist. ep. ccx. xxviii. cap. xxi.—Alvar. Gome-

* Zurita, Anal. tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. x. — Quincuagenas de Oviedo, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 9.

† Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. x.—See also the melancholy vaticinations of Martyr, (ep. cccxi.) who seems to echo back the sentiments of his friends Tendilla and Talavera.

The principal authorities for the events in this chapter, as the reader may remark, are Martyr and Zurita. The former, not merely a spectator, but actor in them, had undoubtedly the most intimate opportunities of observation. He seems to have been sufficiently impartial too, and prompt to do justice to what was really good in Philip's character, although that of his royal master was of course calculated to impress the deepest respect on a person of Martyr's uncommon penetration and sagacity. The Aragonese chronicler, however, though removed to a somewhat further distance as to time, was from that circumstance placed in a point of view more favourable for embracing the whole field of action, than if he had taken part and jostled in the crowd as one of it. He has accordingly given much wider scope to his survey, exhibiting full details of the alleged grievances, pretensions, and policy of the opposite party; and, although condemning them himself without reserve, has conveyed impressions of Ferdinand's conduct less favourable, on the whole, than Martyr.

But neither the Aragonese historian, nor Martyr, nor any contemporary writer, native or foreign, whom I have consulted, countenances the extremely unfavourable portrait which Dr. Robertson has given of Ferdinand in his transactions with Philip. It is difficult to account for the bias which this eminent historian's mind has received in this matter, unless it be that he has taken his impressions from the popular notions entertained of the character of the parties, rather than from the circumstances of the particular case under review; a mode of proceeding extremely objectionable in the present instance, where Philip, however good his natural qualities, was obviously a mere tool in the hands of corrupt and artful men, working exclusively for their own selfish purposes.

CHAPTER XVIII.

COLUMBUS—HIS RETURN TO SPAIN—HIS DEATH.

1504—1506.

WHILE the events were passing which occupy the beginning of the preceding chapter, Christopher Columbus returned from his fourth and last voyage. It had been one unbroken series of disappointment and disaster. After quitting Hispaniola, and being driven by storms nearly to the island of Cuba, he traversed the gulf of Honduras, and coasted along the margin of the golden region which had so long flitted before his fancy. The natives invited him to strike into its western depths in vain, and he pressed forward to the south, now solely occupied with the grand object of discovering a passage into the Indian ocean. At length, after having with great difficulty advanced somewhat beyond the point of Nombre de Dios, he was compelled by the fury of the elements and the murmurs of his men to abandon the enterprise, and retrace his steps. He was subsequently defeated in an attempt to establish a colony on Terra Firma by the ferocity of the natives ; was wrecked on the island of Jamaica, where he was permitted to linger more than a year, through the malice of Ovando, the new governor of St. Domingo; and finally, having reëmbarked with his shattered crew in a vessel freighted at his own expense, was driven by a succession of terrible tempests across the ocean, until, on the 7th of November 1504, he anchored in the little port of St. Lucar, twelve leagues from Seville.*

In this quiet haven, Columbus hoped to find the repose his broken constitution and wounded spirit so much needed, and to obtain a speedy restitution of his honours and emoluments from the hand of Isabella. But here he was to experience his bitterest disappointment. At the time of his arrival, the queen was on her deathbed; and in a very few days Columbus received the afflicting intelligence, that the friend, on whose steady support he had so confidently relied, was no more. It was a deep blow to his hopes, for "he had always experienced favour and protection from her," says his son Ferdinand; "while the king had not only been indifferent, but

* P. Martyr, De Reb. Ocean. et Nov. Orbe, Dec. iii. lib. iv.—Benzoni, Nov. N. Orb. Hist. lib. i. cap. xiv.—Fernando Colon, Hist. del Almirante, c. lxxxviii—cviii.—Herrera, Hist. de las Ind. Occid. Dec. i. lib. v. c. ii—xii.; lib. vi. c. i—xiii.—Navarrete, Viages y Descubr. tom. i. pp. 282—325.

The best authorities for the fourth voyage are the relations of Mendez and Porras, both engaged in it; and, above all, the admiral's own letter to the sovereigns from Jamaica. They are all collected in the first volume of Navarrete. (loc. cit.) Whatever cloud may be thrown over the early part of Columbus's career, there is abundant light on every step of his path after the commencement of his great enterprise.

positively unfriendly to his interests.”* We may readily credit, that a man of the cold and prudent character of the Spanish monarch would not be very likely to comprehend one so ardent and aspiring as that of Columbus, nor to make allowance for his extravagant sallies. And if nothing has hitherto met our eye to warrant the strong language of the son, yet we have seen that the king, from the first, distrusted the admiral’s projects, as having something unsound and chimerical in them.

The affliction of the latter at the tidings of Isabella’s death is strongly depicted in a letter written immediately after to his son Diego. “It is our chief duty,” he says, “to commend to God most affectionately and devoutly the soul of our deceased lady the queen. Her life was always Catholic and virtuous, and prompt to whatever could redound to his holy service ; wherefore we may trust she now rests in glory, far from all concern for this rough and weary world.”†

Columbus, at this time, was so much crippled by the gout, to which he had been long subject, that he was unable to undertake a journey to Segovia, where the court was, during the inclemency of the winter. He lost no time, however, in laying his situation before the king, through his son Diego, who was attached to the royal household. He urged his past services, the original terms of the capitulation made with him, their infringement in almost every particular, and his own necessitous condition. But Ferdinand was too busily occupied with his own concerns, at this crisis, to give much heed to those of Columbus, who repeatedly complains of the inattention shown to his application.* At length, on the approach of a milder season, the admiral, having obtained a dispensation in his favour from the ordinance prohibiting the use of mules, was able by easy journeys to reach Segovia, May 1505, and present himself before the monarch.†

* Hist. del Almirantè, cap. cviii.

† Cartas de Colon, ap. Navarrete, tom. i. p. 341.

He was received with all the outward marks of courtesy and regard by Ferdinand, who assured him that “he fully estimated his important services, and, far from stinting his recompense to the precise terms of the capitulation, intended to confer more ample favours on him in Castile.” ‡

These fair words, however, were not seconded by actions. The king probably had no serious thoughts of reinstating the admiral in his government. His successor, Ovando, was high in the royal favour. His rule, however objectionable as regards the Indians, was every way acceptable to the Spanish co-

* See his interesting correspondence with his son Diego; now printed for the first time by Señor Navarrete from the original MSS. in the Duke of Veragua's possession. Viages y Descubr. tom. i. p. 338, et seq.

† Herrera, Hist. de las Ind.

Occidental. Dec. i. lib. vi. cap. xiv.—Hist. del Almirante, cap. cviii.

For an account of this ordinance, see vol. ii. p. 439, note †, of this History.

‡ Herrera, Hist. de las Ind. Dec. i. lib. vi. cap. xiv.

lonists ; * and even his oppression of the poor natives was so far favourable to his cause, that it enabled him to pour much larger sums into the royal coffers than had been gleaned by his more humane predecessor.†

The events of the last voyage, moreover, had probably not tended to dispel any distrust, which the king previously entertained of the admiral's capacity for government. His men had been in a state of perpetual insubordination ; while his letter to the sovereigns, written under distressing circumstances, indeed, from Jamaica, exhibited such a deep colouring of despondency, and occasionally such wild and visionary projects, as might almost suggest the suspicion of a temporary alienation of mind.‡

But whatever reasons may have operated to postpone Columbus's restoration to power, it was the grossest injustice to withhold from him the revenues secured by the original contract with the crown. According to his own statement, he was so far from receiving his share of the remittances made by Ovan-do, that he was obliged to borrow money, and had

* Herrera, Hist. de las Ind. Occid. Dec. i. lib. v. c. xii.

† Ibid. Dec. i. lib. v. cap. xii. ; lib. vi. c. xvi—xviii.—Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xix. c. xiv.

‡ This document exhibits a medley, in which sober narrative and sound reasoning are strangely blended with crazy dreams, doleful lamentation, and wild schemes for the recovery of Jerusalem, the conversion of the Grand Khan, &c. Vagaries like these, which come occasionally like clouds over his soul, to shut out the light of reason, cannot fail to fill the mind of the reader, as they doubtless did those of the sovereigns at the time, with mingled sentiments of wonder and compassion. See Carta de Colon, ap. Navarrete, tom. i. p. 296.

actually incurred a heavy debt for his necessary expenses.* The truth was, that as the resources of the new countries began to develop themselves more abundantly, Ferdinand felt greater reluctance to comply with the letter of the original capitulation; he now considered the compensation as too vast, and altogether disproportioned to the services of any subject; and at length was so ungenerous as to propose that the admiral should relinquish his claims, in consideration of other estates and dignities to be assigned him in Castile.† It argued less knowledge of character than the king usually showed, that he should have thought the man, who had broken off all negotiations on the threshold of a dubious enterprise, rather than abate one tittle of his demands, would consent to such abatement when the success of that enterprise was so gloriously established.

What assistance Columbus actually received from the crown at this time, or whether he received any, does not appear. He continued to reside with the court, and accompanied it in its removal to Valladolid. He no doubt enjoyed the public consideration due to his high repute and extraordinary achievements; though by the monarch he might be regarded in the unwelcome light of a creditor, whose claims were too just to be disavowed, and too large to be satisfied.

* Cartas de Colon, ap. Navarrete, tom. i. p. 338.

† Fern. Colon, Hist. del Al-

mirante, cap. cviii. — Herrera, Hist. Ind. Occidental. lib. vi. c. xiv.

With spirits broken by this unthankful requital of his services, and with a constitution impaired by a life of unmitigated hardship, Columbus's health now rapidly sunk under the severe and reiterated attacks of his disorder. On the arrival of Philip and Joanna, he addressed a letter to them, through his brother Bartholomew, in which he lamented the infirmities which prevented him from paying his respects in person, and made a tender of his future services. The communication was graciously received, but Columbus did not survive to behold the young sovereigns.*

His mental vigour, however, was not impaired by the ravages of disease, and, on the 19th of May 1506, he executed a codicil, confirming certain testamentary dispositions formerly made, with special reference to the entail of his estates and dignities; manifesting, in his latest act, the same solicitude he had shown through life to perpetuate an honourable name. Having completed these arrangements with perfect composure, he expired on the following day, May 20th, 1506, being that of our Lord's ascension, with little apparent suffering, and in the most Christian spirit of resignation.† His remains, first deposited in the convent of St. Francis at Valladolid, were, six years later, removed to the Carthusian monastery of Las Cuevas at Seville, where a costly

* Navarrete has given the letter, Viages y Desc. tom. iii. p. 530.—Herrera, ubi supra.¹

† Zuñiga, Anales de Sevilla,

p. 429.—Hist. del Almirante, cap. cviii.—Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. cxxxi.—Navarrete, tom. ii. Doc. Dip. 158.

monument was raised over them by King Ferdinand, with the memorable inscription,

A Castilla y a Leon Nuevo mundo dió Colon ;

“ the like of which,” says his son Ferdinand, with as much truth as simplicity, “ was never recorded of any man in ancient or modern times.” * From this spot his body was transported, in the year 1536, to the island of St. Domingo, the proper theatre of his discoveries ; and, on the cession of that island to the French, in 1795, was again removed to Cuba, where his ashes now quietly repose in the cathedral church of its capital. †

There is considerable uncertainty as to Columbus’s age, though it seems probable it was not far from seventy at the time of his death. ‡ His person has

* Hist. del Almirante, ubi sup.

The following eulogium of Paolo Giovio is a pleasing tribute to the deserts of the great navigator, showing the high estimation in which he was held, abroad as well as at home, by the enlightened of his own day. “ Incomparabilis Liguribus honos, eximium Italiæ decus, et præfulgidum jubar seculo nostro nasceretur, quod priscorum heroum, Herculis, et Liberi patris, famam obscuraret. Quorum memoriam grata olim mortalitas æternis literarum monumentis cœlo consecrârit.” Elogiorum, lib. iv. p. 123.

† Navarrete, Viages y Descubr. tom. ii. Doc. Dip. 177.

On the left of the grand altar of this stately edifice, is a bust of Columbus, placed in a niche in the wall, and near it a silver urn, containing all that now remains of the illustrious voyager. See Abbot’s Letters from Cuba, a work of much interest and information, with the requisite allowance for the inaccuracies of a posthumous publication.

‡ The various theories respecting the date of Columbus’s birth cover a range of twenty years, from 1436 to 1456. There are sturdy objections to either of the hypotheses ; and the historian will find it easier to cut the knot than to unravel it. Cf. Navarrete, tom. i. Intr. sec. liv.—Muñoz, Hist. del Nuevo Mundo, been minutely described by his son. He was tall and well made, his head large, with an aquiline nose, small light blue or greyish eyes, a fresh complexion and red hair, though incessant toil and exposure had bronzed the former, and bleached the latter, before the age of thirty. He had a majestic presence, with much dignity, and at the same time affability of manner. He was fluent, even eloquent in discourse; generally temperate, though sometimes hurried by a too lively sensibility into a sally of passion.* He was abstemious in his diet, indulged little in amusements of any kind, and, in truth, seemed too much absorbed by the great cause to which he had consecrated his life, to allow scope for the lower pursuits and pleasures which engage ordinary men. Indeed, his imagination, by feeding too exclusively on this lofty theme, acquired an unnatural exaltation, which raised him too much above the sober realities of existence, leading him to spurn at difficulties which in the end proved insurmountable, and to colour the future with those rainbow tints which too often melted into air.

This exalted state of the imagination was the result in part, no doubt, of the peculiar circumstances of his life; for the glorious enterprise he had achieved almost justified the conviction of his acting under the influence of some higher inspiration than

lib. ii. sec. xii.—Spotorno, Memoir of Col. trans. pp. 12. 25.—Irving, Life of Columbus, vol. iv. c. xviii. ch. iv.

* Hist. del Almirante, cap. iii.—N. N. Orb. Histor. lib. i. c. xiv.—Herrera, Indias Occid. Dec. i. lib. vi. cap. xv.

mere human reason, and led his devout mind to discern intimations respecting himself in the dark and mysterious annunciations of sacred prophecy.*

That the romantic colouring of his mind, however, was natural to him, and not purely the growth of circumstances, is evident from the chimerical speculations in which he seriously indulged before the accomplishment of his great discoveries. His scheme of a crusade for the recovery of the holy sepulchre was most deliberately meditated, and strenuously avowed from the very first date of his proposals to the Spanish government. His enthusiastic communications on the subject must have provoked a smile from a pontiff like Alexander VI;† and may suggest some apology for the tardiness with which his more rational projects were accredited by the Castilian government. But these visionary fancies never clouded his judgment in matters relating to his great undertaking, and it is curious to observe the prophetic accuracy with which he discerned, not only the existence, but the eventual resources of the Western World; as is sufficiently evinced by his precautions, to the very last, to secure the full fruits of them, unimpaired, to his posterity.

Whatever were the defects of his mental constitution, the finger of the historian will find it difficult to point to a single blemish in his moral character. His correspondence breathes the sentiment of devoted loyalty to his sovereigns. His conduct habitually displayed the utmost solicitude for the interests of his followers. He expended almost his last maravedi in restoring his unfortunate crew to their native land. His dealings were regulated by the nicest principles of honour and justice. His last communication to the sovereigns from the Indies remonstrates against the use of violent measures in order to extract gold from the natives, as a thing equally scandalous and impolitic.* The grand object to which he dedicated himself seemed to expand his whole soul, and raised it above the petty shifts and artifices by which great ends are sometimes compassed. There are some men in whom rare virtues have been closely allied, if not to positive vice, to degrading weakness. Columbus's character presented no such humiliating incongruity. Whether we contemplate it in its public or private relations, in all its features it wears the same noble aspect. It was in perfect harmony with the grandeur of his plans and their results, more stupendous than those which Heaven has permitted any other mortal to achieve.†

* See the extracts from Columbus's book of prophecies, ap. Navarrete, (tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. No. 140,) as still existing in the Bibliotheca Colombina at Seville.

† See his epistle to the most selfish and sensual of the successors of St. Peter, in Navarrete, Viages, tom. ii. Doc. Dip. No. 145.

* "El oro, bien que segun informacion el sea mucho, no me pareció bien ni servicio de vuestras Altezas de se le tomar por via de robo. La buena orden evitará escándolo y mala fama," &c. Carta de Colon, ap. Navarrete, tom. i. p. 310.

† Columbus left two sons, Fernando and Diego. The former, illegitimate, inherited his father's genius, says a Castilian writer; and the latter, his honours and estates. (Zuñiga, Anal. de Sevilla, año 1506.) Ferdinand, besides other works now lost, left a valuable memoir of his father, often cited in this History. He was a person of rather uncommon literary attainments, and amassed a library, in his extensive travels, of 20,000 volumes, perhaps the largest private collection in Europe at that day. (Ibid. año 1539.) Diego did not succeed to his father's dignities till he had obtained a judgment in his favour against the crown from the council of the Indies ; an act highly honourable to that tribunal, and showing that the independence of the courts of justice, the greatest bulwark of civil liberty, was well maintained under King Ferdinand. (Navarrete, tom. ii. Doc. Dipl. Nos. 163, 164 ; tom. iii. Supl. Col. Dip. No. 69.) The young admiral subsequently married a lady of the great Toledo family, niece of the Duke of Alva. (Quincuagenas de Oviedo, MS.

Bat. 1, quinc. 2, dial. 8.)— This alliance with one of the most ancient branches of the haughty aristocracy of Castile, proves the extraordinary consideration which Columbus must have attained during his own lifetime. A new opposition was made by Charles V. to the succession of Diego's son ; and the latter, discouraged by the prospect of this interminable litigation with the crown, prudently consented to commute his claims, too vast and indefinite for any subject to enforce, for specific honours and revenues in Castile. The titles of Duke of Veragua and Marquis of Jamaica, derived from the places visited by the admiral in his last voyage, still distinguish the family, whose proudest title, above all that monarchs can confer, is to have descended from Columbus. Spotorno, Hist. Memoir of Columbus, p. 123.

CHAPTER XIX.

N AND DEATH OF PHILIP I. — PROCEEDINGS IN CASTILE. — FERDINAND VISITS NAPLES.

1506.

ING FERDINAND had no sooner concluded the agement with Philip, and withdrawn into his litary dominions, than the archduke and his proceeded towards Valladolid, to receive the age of the estates convened in that city. Joan-ppressed with an habitual melancholy, and clad e sable habiliments better suited to a season of ining than rejoicing, refused the splendid cereal and festivities with which the city was pre-l to welcome her. Her dissipated husband, had long since ceased to treat her not merely affection, but even decency, would fain have aded the cortes to authorize her confinement, sordered in intellect, and to devolve on him the e charge of government. In this he was sup-d by the Archbishop of Toledo, and some of the ipal nobility. But the thing was distasteful to ommons, who could not brook such an indignity to their own ‘natural sovereign;’ and they were so staunchly supported by the admiral Enriquez, a grandee of the highest authority from his connexion with the crown, that Philip was at length induced to abandon his purpose, and content himself with a similar act of recognition with that made at Toro.* No notice whatever was taken of the Catholic king, or his recent arrangement transferring the regency to Philip. July 12th, 1506. The usual oaths of allegiance were tendered to Joanna as queen and lady proprietor of the kingdom, and to Philip as her husband, and finally to their eldest son, Prince Charles, as heir-apparent and lawful successor on the demise of his mother.†

By the tenor of these acts the royal authority would seem to be virtually vested in Joanna. From this moment, however, Philip assumed the government into his own hands. The effects were soon visible in the thorough revolution introduced into every department. Old incumbents in office were ejected without ceremony, to make way for new favourites. The Flemings, in particular, were placed in every considerable post, and the principal fort—

* Marina tells an anecdote, too long for insertion here, in relation to this cortes, showing the sturdy stuff of which a Castilian commoner in that day was made. (Teoría de las Cortes, P. ii. cap. vii.) It will scarcely gain credit without a better voucher than the anonymous scribbler from whom he has borrowed it.

† Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii — cap. xxii. — Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xi.—Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xv.

Joanna on this occasion ~~was~~ careful to inspect the powers of the deputies herself, to see they were all regularly authenticated. Singular astuteness for a mad woman !

resses of the kingdom intrusted to their keeping. No length or degree of service was allowed to plead in behalf of the ancient occupant. The Marquis and Marchioness of Moya, the personal friends of the late queen, and who had been particularly recommended by her to her daughter's favour, were forcibly expelled from Segovia, whose strong citadel was given to Don Juan Manuel. There were no limits to the estates and honours lavished on this crafty minion.*

The style of living at the court was on the most thoughtless scale of wasteful expenditure. The public revenues, notwithstanding liberal appropriations by the late cortes, were wholly unequal to it. To supply the deficit, offices were sold to the highest bidder. The income drawn from the silk manufactures of Granada, which had been appropriated to defray King Ferdinand's pension, was assigned by Philip to one of the royal treasurers. Fortunately, Ximenes obtained possession of the order, and had the boldness to tear it in pieces. He then waited on the young monarch, and remonstrated with him on the recklessness of measures which must infallibly ruin his credit with the people. Philip yielded in this instance; but although he treated the archbishop with the greatest outward deference, it is not easy to discern the habitual influence over his counsels, claimed for the latter by his adulatory biographers.*

* P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxii. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. xxii. — Lanuza, Hist. de Arag. tom. i. lib. i. cap. xxi.

— Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximen. fol. 65. — Quincuagenas, de Oviedo, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 1, dial. 23.

All this could not fail to excite disgust and disquietude throughout the nation. The most alarming symptoms of insubordination began to appear in different parts of the kingdom. In Andalusia, in particular, a confederation of the nobles was organized, with the avowed purpose of rescuing the queen from the duress in which it was said she was held by her husband. At the same time the most tumultuous scenes were exhibited in Cordova, in consequence of the high hand with which the Inquisition was carrying matters there. Members of many of the principal families, including persons of both sexes, had been arrested on the charge of heresy. This sweeping proscription provoked an insurrection, countenanced by the Marquis of Priego, in which the prisons were broken open, and Lucero, an Inquisitor, who had made himself deservedly odious by his cruelties, narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the infuriated populace.† The Grand Inquisitor, Deza_____

* Robles, Vida de Ximenes, cap. xvii. — A. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximen. fol. 65. — Abarca, Rey xxx. cap. xvi. — Quintanilla, Vida de Cisneros, lib. iii. cap. xiv.

† Lucero (whom honest Martyr, with a sort of backhanded pun, usually nicknames Tenebrero) resumed his inquisitorial functions on Philip's death. Among his subsequent victims was the good Archbishop Tala-vera, whose last days were embittered by his persecution. His insane violence at length provoked again the interference of government. His case was referred to a special commission, with Ximenes at its head. Sentence was pronounced against him. The prisons he had filled were emptied. His judgments were reversed, as founded on insufficient and frivolous grounds. But, alas ! what was this to the Archbishop of Seville,* the steady friend of Columbus, but whose name is unhappily registered on some of the darkest pages of the tribunal, was so intimidated as to resign his office. The whole affair was referred to the royal council by Philip, whose Flemish education had not predisposed him to any reverence for the institution ; a circumstance which operated quite as much to his prejudice with the more bigoted part of the nation, as his really exceptionable acts.†

The minds of the wise and the good were filled with sadness as they listened to the low murmurs of hundreds he had consigned to the stake, and the thousands he had plunged in misery. He was in the end sentenced—not to be roasted alive—but to retire to his own benefice, and confine himself to the duties of a Christian minister ! Alv. Gomecius, fol. 77. — Pet. Martyr. epist. cccxxxiii. cccxxxiv. et al.—Llorente, tom. i. chap. x. art. iii. iv. — Oviedo, Quincuagenas, dial. de Deza, MS.

* Oviedo has given an ample notice of this prelate, Ferdinand's confessor, in one of his dialogues. He mentions a singular taste, in one respect, quite worthy of an inquisitor. The archbishop kept a tame lion in his palace, which used to accompany him when he went abroad, and lie down at his feet when he said mass in the church. The monster had been stripped of his teeth and claws when young, but he was " espantable en su vista é aspeto," says Oviedo, who records two or three of his gambols, lion's play, at best. Quincuagenas, MS.

† Llorente, Hist. de l'Inquisit. tom. i. chap. x. art. iii. iv. — Abarca, Rey xxx. cap. xvi. — Quincuagenas de Oviedo, MS. — P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxxxiii. cccxxxiv. et al.

" Toda la gente," says Zurita, in reference to this affair, " noble y de limpia sangre se avia escandalizado dello;" (Anal. tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xi.) and he plainly intimates his conviction, that Philip's profane interference brought Heaven's vengeance on his head, in the shape of a premature death. Zurita was secretary of the Holy Office in the early part of the sixteenth century. Had he lived in the nineteenth, he might have acted the part of a Llorente. He was certainly not born for a bigot.

popular discontent, which seemed to be gradually swelling into strength for some terrible convulsion, and they looked back with fond regret to the halcyon days which they had enjoyed under the temperate rule of Ferdinand and Isabella.

The Catholic king, in the mean time, was pursuing his voyage to Naples. He had been earnestly pressed by the Neapolitans to visit his new dominions, soon after the conquest.* He now went, less, however, in compliance with that request, than to relieve his own mind by assuring himself of the fidelity of his viceroy, Gonsalvo de Cordova. That illustrious man had not escaped the usual lot of humanity; his brilliant successes had brought on him a full measure of the envy which seems to wait on merit like its shadow. Even men like Rojas, the Castilian ambassador at Rome, and Prospero Colonna, the distinguished Italian commander, condescended to employ their influence at court to depreciate the Great Captain's services, and raise suspicions of his loyalty. His courteous manners, bountiful largesses, and magnificent style of living, were represented as politic arts to seduce the affections of the soldiery and the people. His services were in the market for the highest bidder. He had received the most splendid offers from the King of France and the pope. He had carried on a correspondence with Maximilian and Philip, who would purchase his adhesion, if possible, to the latter, at any price; and if he had not hitherto committed himself by any overt act, it seemed probable he was only waiting to be determined in his future course by the result of King Ferdinand's struggle with his son-in-law.*

* Summonte, Storia di Napoli, tom. iv. lib. vi. c. v.

These suggestions, in which some truth, as usual, was mingled with a large infusion of error, gradually excited more and more uneasiness in the breast of the cautious and naturally distrustful Ferdinand. He at first endeavoured to abridge the powers of the Great Captain, by recalling half the troops in his service, notwithstanding the unsettled state of the kingdom,† He then took the decisive step of ordering his return to Castile, on pretence of employing him in affairs of great importance at home. In order to allure him more effectually, he solemnly pledged himself under oath to transfer to him, on his landing in Spain, the grand-mastership of St. Jago, with all its princely dependencies and emoluments, the noblest gift in the possession of the crown. Finding all this ineffectual, and that Gonsalvo still procrastinated his return on various pretexts, the king's uneasiness increased to such a degree, that he determined to press his own departure for Naples, and bring back, not too late, his too powerful vassal.‡

On the 4th of September 1506, Ferdinand embarked at Barcelona, on board a well-armed squad-

* P. Jovius, Vitæ Illust. Vir. 76.—Abarca, tom. ii. R. xxx. xvi.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. ap. v. xi. xvii. xxvii. xxxi. vii. cap. xiv.—Buonaccorsi, io, p. 123.—Ulloa, Vita di

Carlo V. fol. 36.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. xxiii.

† Mariana, lib. xxviii. cap. xii.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. v.

‡ Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap.

ron of Catalan galleys, taking with him his young and beautiful bride, and a numerous train of Aragonese nobles. On the 24th of the month, after a boisterous and tedious passage, he reached the port of Genoa. Here, Oct. 1, to his astonishment, he was joined by the Great Captain, who, advised of the king's movements, had come from Naples with a small fleet to meet him. This frank conduct of his general, if it did not disarm Ferdinand of his suspicions, showed him the policy of concealing them; and he treated Gonsalvo with all the consideration and show of confidence which might impose, not merely on the public, but on the immediate subject of them.*

The Italian writers of the time express their astonishment that the Spanish general should have so blindly trusted himself into the hands of his suspicious master;† but he, doubtless, felt strong in the consciousness of his own integrity. There appears to have been no good reason for impeaching this; his most equivocal act was his delay to obey the royal summons. But much weight is reasonably vi. — Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. tom. iv. p. 12; ed. Milan, 1803. — Giannone, Istoria di Nap. lib. xxx. cap. i. — P. Jovius, Vitæ, p. 280. — Quincuagenas de Oviedo, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 9.

* Giannone, ubi supra. — Summonte, Stor. di Nap. tom. iv. lib. vi. cap. v. — L. M. Siculo, Cosas Mem. fol. 187. — Buonac-corsi, p. 123. — Capmany, Memorias Historicas, tom. i. p. 152. — “Este,” says Capmany of the squadron which bore the king from Barcelona, “se puede decir fué el último armamento que salió de aquella capital.”

† Guicciardini, tom. iv. p. 30. — Machiavelli, Legaz. ii. a Roma, lett. xxiii. — Giannone, Istor. lib. xxx. cap. i.

due to his own explanation, that he was deterred by the distracted state of the country, arising from the proposed transfer of property to the Angevin barons, as well as from the precipitate disbanding of the army, which it required all his authority to prevent from breaking into open mutiny.* To these motives may be probably added the natural, though perhaps unconscious, reluctance to relinquish the exalted station, little short of absolute sovereignty, which he had so long and so gloriously filled.

He had, indeed, lorded it over his viceroyalty with most princely sway; but he had assumed no powers to which he was not entitled by his services and peculiar situation. His public operations in Italy had been uniformly conducted for the advantage of his country, and, until the late final treaty with France, were mainly directed to the expulsion of that power beyond the Alps.† Since that event, he had busily occupied himself with the internal affairs of Naples, for which he made many excellent provisions, contriving by his consummate address to reconcile the most conflicting interests and parties. Although the idol of the army and the people, there is not the slightest evidence of an attempt to pervert his popularity to an unworthy purpose. There is no appearance of his having been corrupted, or even dazzled, by the splendid offers repeatedly made him by the different potentates of Europe. On the contrary, the proud answer recorded of him to Pope Julius II. breathes a spirit of determined loyalty, perfectly irreconcilable with anything sinister or selfish in his motives.* The Italian writers of the time, who affect to speak of these motives with some distrust, were little accustomed to such examples of steady devotion;† but the historian, who reviews all the circumstances, must admit there was nothing to justify such distrust, and that the only exceptionable acts in Gonsalvo's administration were performed not to advance his own interests, but those of his master, and in too strict obedience to his commands. King Ferdinand was the last person who had cause to complain of them.

* Zurita, lib. vi. cap. xxxi.

† My limits will not allow room for the complex politics and feuds of Italy, into which Gonsalvo entered with all the freedom of an independent potentate. See the details, ap.

Chronica del Gran Capitan, lib. ii. cap. cxii—cxxvii.—Sismondi, Republ. Ital. tom. xiii. chap. ciii. —Guicciardini, tom. iii. p. 235, et alibi.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. vii. ix. —Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. vii.

After quitting Genoa, the royal squadron was driven by contrary winds into the neighbouring harbour of Portofino, where Ferdinand received intelligence, which promised to change his destination altogether. This was the death of his son-in-law, the young King of Castile.

* Zurita, lib. vi. cap. xi.

† "Il Gran Capitan," says Guicciardini, "conscio dei sospetti, i quali il re forse non vanamente aveva avuti di lui," &c. (Ist. d'Ital. tom. iv. p. 30.) This way of damning a character by surmise is very common with Italian writers of this age, who uniformly resort to the very worst motive as the key of whatever is dubious or inexplicable in conduct. Not a sudden death, for example, occurs, without at least a sospetto of poison from some hand or other. What a fearful commentary on the morals of the land!

This event, so unexpected and awfully sudden, was occasioned by a fever brought on by too violent exercise at a game of ball, at an entertainment made for him by his favourite Manuel, in Burgos, where the court was then held. Through the unskilfulness of his physicians, as it was said, who neglected to bleed him, the disorder rapidly gained ground,* and on the sixth day after his attack, being the 25th of September 1506, he breathed his last.† He was but twenty-eight years old; of which brief period he had enjoyed, or endured, the ‘golden cares’ of sovereignty but little more than two months, dating from his recognition by cortes. His body, after being embalmed, lay in state for two days, decorated with the insignia,—the mockery of royalty, as it had proved to him,—and was then deposited in the convent of Miraflores near Burgos, to await its final removal to Granada, agreeably to his last request.‡

* Philip's disorder was lightly regarded at first by his Flemish physicians; whose practice and predictions were alike condemned by their coadjutor Lodovico Marliano, an Italian doctor highly commended by Martyr, as “inter philosophos et medicos lucida lampas.” He was at least the better prophet on this occasion. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxiii.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xiv.

† Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 9.—Fortunately for Ferdinand's reputation, Philip's death was attended by too unequivocal circumstances, and recorded by too many eye-witnesses, to admit the suggestion of poison. It seems, he drank freely of cold water while very hot. The fever he brought on was an epidemic, which at that time afflicted Castile. Machiavelli, Legaz. ii. a Roma, let. xxix.—Zuñiga, Anal. año 1506.

‡ P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxiii. cccxvi.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccvi.—Alv. Gomecius, fol. 66.—Carbajal, Anales, MS. año

Philip was of middle height; he had a fair, florid complexion, regular features, long flowing locks, and a well-made symmetrical figure. Indeed, he was so distinguished for comeliness both of person and countenance, that he is designated on the roll of Spanish sovereigns as Felipe el Hermoso, or the Handsome.* His mental endowments were not so extraordinary. The father of Charles V. possessed scarcely a single quality in common with his remarkable son. He was rash and impetuous in his temper, frank and careless. He was born to great expectations, and early accustomed to command, which seemed to fill him with a crude, intemperate ambition, impatient alike of control or counsel. He was not without generous, and even magnanimous sentiments; but he abandoned himself to the impulse of the moment, whether for good or evil, and as he was naturally indolent, and fond of pleasure, he willingly reposed the toil of government on others, who, as usual, thought more of their own interests than those of the public. His early education exempted him from the bigotry characteristic of the Spaniards; and, had he lived, he 1506.—L. M. Siculo, Cosas Memor. fol. 187.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 11.

* L. M. Siculo, fol. 187, 188.—Sandoval, ubi supra.

Martyr, touched with the melancholy fate of his young sovereign, pays the following not inelegant, and certainly not parsimonious tribute to his memory, in a letter written a few days after his death, which, it may be noticed, he makes a day earlier than other contemporary accounts. “Octavo calendas Octobris armam emisit ille juvenis, formosus, pulcher, elegans, animo polens et ingenio, proceræ validæque naturæ, uti flos vernus evanuit.” Opus Epist. ep. cccxvi.

might have done much to mitigate the grievous abuses of the inquisition. As it was, his premature death deprived him of the opportunity of compensating, by this single good act, the manifold mischiefs of his administration.

This event, too improbable to have formed any part of the calculations of the most far-sighted politician, spread general consternation throughout the country. The old adherents of Ferdinand, with Ximenes at their head, now looked forward with confidence to his reëstablishment in the regency. Many others, however, like Garcilasso de la Vega, whose loyalty to their old master had not been proof against the times, viewed this with some apprehension.* Others, again, who had openly from the first linked their fortunes to those of his rival, as the Duke of Najara, the Marquis of Villena, and, above all, Don Juan Manuel, saw in it their certain ruin, and turned their thoughts towards Maximilian, or the King of Portugal, or any other monarch whose connexion with the royal family might afford a plausible pretext for interference in the government. On Philip's Flemish followers the tidings fell like a thunderbolt, and in their bewilderment they seemed like so many famished birds of prey, still hovering round the half-

* Garcilasso de la Vega appears to have been one of those dubious politicians who, to make use of a modern phrase, are always on the fence. The wags of his day applied to him a coarse saying of the old Duke of Alva in Henry IV.'s time, "Que era como el perro del ventero, que ladra a los de fuera, y muerde a los de dentro."—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xxxix.

devoured carcass from which they had been unceremoniously scared.*

The weight of talent and popular consideration was undoubtedly on the king's side. The most formidable of the opposition, Manuel, had declined greatly in credit with the nation during the short disastrous period of his administration. While the Archbishop of Toledo, who might be considered as the leader of Ferdinand's party, possessed talents, energy, and reputed sanctity of character, which, combined with the authority of his station, gave him unbounded influence over all classes of the Castilians. It was fortunate for the land, in this emergency, that the primacy was in such able hands. It justified the wisdom of Isabella's choice, made in opposition, it may be remembered, to the wishes of Ferdinand, who was now to reap the greatest benefit from it.

That prelate, foreseeing the anarchy likely to arise on Philip's death, assembled the nobility present at the court, in his own palace, the day before this event took place. It was there agreed to name a provisional council, or regency, who should carry on the government, and provide for the tranquillity of the kingdom. It consisted of seven members with the Archbishop of Toledo at its head, the Duke del Infantado, the Grand Constable, and the Admiral of Castile, both connected with the royal family, the

* Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. ccvi.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. cap. ii. — Bernaldez, Hist. MS. vii. cap. xxii.

Duke de Najara, a principal leader of the opposite faction, and two Flemish lords. No mention was made of Manuel.*

The nobles in a subsequent convention, on the 1st of October, ratified these proceedings, and bound themselves not to carry on private war, or attempt to possess themselves of the queen's person, and to employ all their authority in supporting the provisional government, whose term was limited to the end of December.†

A meeting of cortes was wanting to give validity to their acts, as well as to express the popular will in reference to a permanent settlement of the government. There was some difference of opinion, even among the king's friends, as to the expediency of summoning that body at this crisis; but the greatest impediment arose from the queen's refusal to sign the writs for that purpose.‡

This unhappy lady's condition had become truly deplorable. During her husband's illness she had never left his bedside; but neither then, nor since his

* Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xv.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. i.—P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxvii.—Zuñiga, Anal. de Sev. año 1506.—Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximenii, fol. 67.

† Zurita, Anal. de Arag. tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xvi.

I find no authority for the statement made by Alvaro Gomez, (fol. 68,) and faithfully echoed by Robles (cap. xvii.) and Quintanilla, (lib. iii. cap. xiv.)

that Ximenes filled the office of sole regent at this juncture. It is not warranted by Martyr, (epist. cccxvii.) and is contradicted by the words of the original instrument cited as usual by Zurita. (loc. cit.) The archbishop's biographers, one and all, claim as many merits and services for their hero, as if, like Quintanilla, they were working expressly for his beatification.

‡ The Duke of Alva, the death, had been seen to shed a tear. She remained in a state of stupid insensibility, sitting in a darkened apartment, her head resting on her hand, and her lips closed, as mute and immovable as a statue. When applied to, for issuing the necessary summons for the cortes, or to make appointments to office, or for any other pressing business, which required her signature, she replied, "My father will attend to all this when he returns; he is much more conversant with business than I am; I have no other duties now, but to pray for the soul of my departed husband." The only orders she was known to sign were for paying the salaries of her Flemish musicians; for in her abject state she found some consolation in music, of which she had been passionately fond from childhood. The few remarks which she uttered were discreet and sensible, forming a singular staunch supporter of King Ferdinand in all his difficulties, objected to calling the cortes together, on the grounds that the summons would be informal, not being made by the proper authority; that many cities might consequently refuse to obey them, and the acts of the remainder be open to objection, as not those of the nation; that, after all, should cortes assemble, it was quite uncertain under what influences it might be made to act, and whether it would pursue the course most expedient for Ferdinand's interests; and finally, that if the intention was to procure the appointment of a regency, this had already been done by the nomination of King Ferdinand at Toro, in 1505; that, to start the question anew, was unnecessarily to bring that act into doubt. The duke does not seem to have considered that Ferdinand had forfeited his original claim to the regency by his abdication; perhaps, on the ground that it had never been formally accepted by the commons. I shall have occasion to return to this hereafter. See the discussion in extenso ap. Zurita, lib. vii. cap. xxvi.

contrast with the general extravagance of her actions. On the whole, however, her pertinacity in refusing to sign anything was attended with as much good as evil, since it prevented her name from being used, as it would undoubtedly have often been in the existing state of things, for pernicious and party purposes.*

Finding it impossible to obtain the queen's co-operation, the council at length resolved to issue the writs of summons in their own name, as a measure justified by necessity. The place of meeting was fixed at Burgos in the ensuing month of November, and great pains were taken that the different cities should instruct their representatives in their views respecting the ultimate disposition of the government.†

Long before this, indeed immediately after Philip's death, letters had been despatched by Ximenes and his friends to the Catholic king, acquainting him with the state of affairs, and urging his immediate return to Castile. He received them at Portofino. He determined, however, to continue his voyage, in which he had already advanced so far, to Naples. The wary monarch perhaps thought that the Castilians, whose attachment to his own person he might with some reason distrust, would not be the less inclined to his rule, after having tasted the bitterness of anarchy. In his reply, therefore, after briefly expressing a decent regret at the untimely death of his son-in-law, and his undoubting confidence in the loyalty of the Castilians to their queen, his daughter, he prudently intimates that he retains nothing but kindly recollections of his ancient subjects, and promises to use all possible despatch in adjusting the affairs of Naples, that he may again return to them.*

* P. Martyr, ep. cccxviii.— ii.—A. Gomecius, De Reb.Gest. Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. Xim. fol. 71—73.

† Zurita, lib. vii. cap. xxii.

After this, the king resumed his voyage, and having touched at several places on the coast, in all which he was received with great enthusiasm, arrived before the capital of his new dominions in the latter part of October. All were anxious, says the great Tuscan historian of the time, to behold the prince who had acquired a mighty reputation throughout Europe for his victories both over Christian and Infidel, and whose name was everywhere revered for the wisdom and equity with which he had ruled in his own kingdom. They looked to his coming, therefore, as an event fraught with importance, not merely to Naples, but to all Italy, where his personal presence and authority might do so much to heal

* L. M. Siculo, Cosas Mem. fol. 187. — Zuñiga, Anal. de Sevil. año 1506. — P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxvii. — Alv. Gomecius, fol. 68, 69. 71.

Shall we wrong Ferdinand much by applying to him the pertinent verses of Lucan, on a somewhat similar occasion ?

——— “ *Tutumque putavi Jam bonus esse socer ; lacrymas non sponte cadentes Effudit, gemitusque expressit pectore læto,
Non aliter manifesta putans abs-condere mentis
Gaudia, quàm lacrymis.*”
Pharsalia, lib. ix.

existing feuds, and establish permanent tranquillity.* The Neapolitans, in particular, whose allegiance, as we have more than once had occasion to observe, was rather a transferable commodity, were intoxicated with joy at his arrival. The most splendid preparations were made for his reception. A fleet of twenty vessels of war came out to meet him and conduct him into port ; and, as he touched the shores of his new dominions, the air was rent with acclamations of the people, and with the thunders of artillery from the fortresses which crowned the heights of the city, and from the gallant navy which rode in her waters.†

The faithful chronicler of los Palacios, who generally officiates as the master of ceremonies on these occasions, dilates with great complacency on all the circumstances of the celebration, even to the minutest details of the costume worn by the king and his nobility. According to him, the monarch was arrayed in a long, flowing mantle of crimson velvet, lined with satin of the same colour. On his head was a black velvet bonnet, garnished with a resplendent ruby, and a pearl of inestimable price. He rode

* “ Un Re glorioso per tante vittorie avute contro gl’ Infedeli, e contro i Cristiani, venerabile per opinione di prudenza, e del quale risonava fama cristianissima, che avesse con singolare giustizia e tranquillità governato i Reami suoi.” Guicciardini, Istor. d’Ital. tom. iv. p. 31. — Also a noble white charger, whose burnished caparisons dazzled the eye with their splendour. By his side was his young queen, mounted on a milk-white palfrey, and wearing a skirt, or under garment, of rich brocade, and a French robe, simply fastened with clasps, or loops of fine wrought gold.

Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 124.—Giannone, lib. xxx. cap. i.

† Summonte, Stor. di Nap. tom. iv. lib. vi. cap. v. — Guicciardini, tom. iv. p. 31.—P. Jovius, Vitæ Illustr. Viror. pp. 278, 279.—Bembo, Istor. Viniziana, lib. vii.

On the mole they were received by the Great Captain, who, surrounded by his guard of halberdiers, and his silken array of pages wearing his device, displayed all the pomp and magnificence of his household. After passing under a triumphal arch, where Ferdinand swore to respect the liberties and privileges of Naples, the royal pair moved forward under a gorgeous canopy borne by the members of the municipality, while the reins of their steeds were held by some of the principal nobles. After them followed the other lords and cavaliers of the kingdom, with the clergy, and ambassadors assembled from every part of Italy and Europe, bearing congratulations and presents from their respective courts. As the procession halted in the various quarters of the city, it was greeted with joyous bursts of music from a brilliant assemblage of knights and ladies, who did homage by kneeling down and saluting the hands of their new sovereigns. At length, after defiling through the principal streets and squares, it reached the great cathedral, where the day was devoutly closed with solemn prayer and thanksgiving.*

* Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. sup. — Garibay, Compend, Hist. ccx. — Zurita, Anal. tom. vi. lib. lib. xx. cap. ix. vii. cap. xx. — P. Jovius, ubi

...Ferdinand was too severe an economist of time to waste it willingly on idle pomp and ceremonial. His heart swelled with satisfaction, however, as he gazed on the magnificent capital thus laid at his feet, and pouring forth the most lively expressions of a loyalty which of late he had been led to distrust. With all his impatience, therefore, he was not disposed to rebuke this spirit by abridging the season of hilarity; but, after allowing sufficient scope for its indulgence, he devoted himself assiduously to the great purposes of his visit.

He summoned a parliament general of the kingdom, where, after his own recognition, oaths of allegiance were tendered to his daughter Joanna and her posterity, as his successors, without any allusion being made to the rights of his wife. This was a clear violation of the treaty with France; but Ferdinand, though late, was too sensible of the folly of that stipulation which secured the reversion of his wife's power to the latter crown to allow it to receive any sanction from the Neapolitans.*

Another, and scarcely less disastrous provision of the treaty, he complied with in better faith. This was the reëstablishment of the Angevin proprietors in their ancient estates; the greater part of which, already noticed, had been parcelled out among his followers, both Spaniards and Italians. It was, of course, a work of extraordinary difficulty and duration. When any flaw or impediment could be raised in the Angevin title, the transfer was evaded when it could not, a grant of other land or money was substituted, if possible : more frequently, however, the equivalent, which probably was not very scrupulously meted out, was obliged to be taken from the Aragonese proprietor. To accomplish this, the king was compelled to draw largely on the royal patrimony in Naples, as well as to make liberal appropriations of land and rents in his native dominions. As all this proved insufficient, he was driven to the expedient of replenishing the exchequer by draughts on his new subjects.*

Zurita, ubi sup.—Guicciardini, tom. iv. pp. 72, 73.

The result, although effected without violence or disorder, was unsatisfactory to all parties. The Angevins rarely received the full extent of their demands. The loyal partisans of Aragon saw the fruit of many a hard-fought battle snatched from their grasp, to be given back again to their enemies. Lastly, the wretched Neapolitans, instead of the favours and immunities incident to a new reign, found themselves burdened with additional imposts, which in the exhausted state of the country, were perfectly intolerable. So soon were the fair expectations formed of Ferdinand's coming, like most other indefinite

* Giannone, Ist. di Napoli, lib. xxx. cap. i. — Summonte, Stor. di Nap. tom. iv. lib. vi. cap. v. — Buonaccorsi, p. 129. — Guicciardini, tom. iv. p. 71.

† Such, for example, was the fate of the doughty little cavalier, Pedro de la Paz, the gallant Leyva, so celebrated in the subsequent wars of Charles V, the ambassador Rojas, the quixotic Paredes, and others. The last of these adventurers, according to Mariana, endeavoured to repair his broken fortunes by driving the trade of a corsair in the Levant. Hist. de España tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. iv.

expectations, clouded over by disappointment; and such were some of the bitter fruits of the disgraceful treaty with Louis XII.*

* If any one would see a perfect specimen of the triumph of style, let him compare the interminable prolixities of Zurita with Mariana, who, in this portion of his narrative, has embodied the facts and opinions of his predecessor, with scarcely any alteration, save that of greater condensation, in his own transparent and harmonious diction. It is quite as great a miracle in its way as the rifacimento of Berni.

CHAPTER XX.

FERDINAND'S RETURN AND REGENCY.—GONSALVO'S HONOURS AND RETIREMENT.

1506 — 1509.

WHILE Ferdinand was thus occupied in Naples, the representatives of most of the cities, summoned by the provisional government, had assembled in Burgos, Nov. 1506. Before entering on business, they were desirous to obtain the queen's sanction to their proceedings. A committee waited on her for that purpose, but she obstinately refused to give them audience.*

She still continued plunged in moody melancholy, exhibiting, however, occasionally the wildest freaks of insanity. Towards the latter end of December, she determined to leave Burgos, and remove her husband's remains to their final resting-place in Granada. She insisted on seeing them herself, before her departure. The remonstrances of her counselors, and the holy men of the monastery of Miraflores, proved equally fruitless. Opposition only roused her passions into frenzy, and they were obliged to comply with her mad humours. The corpse was removed from the vault ; the two coffins of lead and wood were opened, and such as chose gazed on the mouldering relics, which, notwithstanding their having been embalmed, exhibited scarcely a trace of humanity. The queen was not satisfied till she touched them with her own hand, which she did without shedding a tear, or testifying the least emotion. The unfortunate lady, indeed, was said never to have been seen to weep since she detected her husband's intrigue with the Flemish courtesan.

* Mariana, Hist. de Esp. tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. ii.—Zu-rita, Anal. de Arag. tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xxix.

The body was then placed on a magnificent car, or hearse, drawn by four horses. It was accompanied by a long train of ecclesiastics and nobles, who, together with the queen, left the city on the night of the 20th of December. She made her journeys by night, saying, that " a widow, who had lost the sun of her own soul, should never expose herself to the light of day." When she halted, the body was deposited in some church or monastery, where the funeral services were performed, as if her husband had just died ; and a corps of armed men kept constant guard, chiefly, as it would seem, with the view of preventing any female from profaning the place by her presence ; for Joanna still retained the same jealousy of her sex, which she had unhappily so much cause to feel during Philip's lifetime.*

In a subsequent journey, when at a short distance

* Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxxiv. cccxxxii. cccxxxix. cccxlii. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. iii. — Carbajal, Ana-les, MS. año 1506. — Bernaldez, Hist. MS. cap. ccvi. — Robles, Vida de Ximen. cap. xvii.
" Childish as was the affec-from Torquemada, she ordered the corpse to be carried into the court-yard of a convent, occupied, as she supposed, by monks. She was filled with horror, however, on finding it a nunnery, and immediately commanded the body to be removed into the open fields. Here she encamped with her whole party at dead of night; not, however, until she had caused the coffins to be unsealed, that she might satisfy herself of the safety of her husband's relics; although it was very difficult to keep the torches, during the time, from being extinguished by the violence of the winds, and leaving the company in total darkness.*

tion," says Dr. Dunham, "of Juana for her husband, she did not, as Robertson relates, cause the body to be removed from the sepulchre after it was buried, and brought to her apartment. She once visited the sepulchre, and, after affectionately gazing on the corpse, was persuaded to retire. Robertson seems not to have read, at least not with care, the authorities for the reign of Fernando." (Spain and Portugal, vol. ii. p. 287. Cab. Cycl.) Whoever will take the trouble to examine these authorities, will probably not find Dr. Dunham much more accurate in the matter than his predecessor. Robertson, indeed, draws largely from the Epistles of Pet. Martyr, the best voucher for this period, which his critic apparently has not consulted. In the very page preceding that in which he thus taxes Robertson with inaccuracy, we find him speaking of Charles VIII. as the reigning monarch of France; an error not merely clerical, since it is repeated no less than three times. Such mistakes would be too trivial for notice in any but an author who has made similar ones the ground for unsparing condemnation of others.

* P. Martyr, ep. cccxxxix.

A foolish Carthusian monk, "levi sicco folio levior," to borrow Martyr's words, though more knave than fool probably, filled Joanna with absurd hopes of her husband's returning to life, which, he assured her, had happened, as he had read, to a certain prince after he had been dead fourteen years. As Philip was disembowelled, he was hardly in condition for such an auspicious event. The queen, however, seems to have been caught with it. (Opus Epist. ep. cccxxviii.) Martyr loses all

These mad pranks, savouring of absolute idiocy, were occasionally chequered by other acts of more intelligence, but not less startling. She had early shown a disgust to her father's old counsellors, and especially to Ximenes, who, she thought, interfered too authoritatively in her domestic concerns. Before leaving Burgos, however, she electrified her husband's adherents, by revoking all grants made by the crown since Isabella's death. This, almost the only act she was ever known to sign, was a severe blow to the courtly tribe of sycophants on whom the golden favours of the late reign had been so prodigally showered. At the same time she reformed her privy council, by dismissing the present members, and reinstating those appointed by her royal mother, sarcastically telling one of the ejected counsellors, that he might go and complete his studies at Salamanca." The remark had a biting edge to it, as the worthy jurist was reputed somewhat low in his scholarship.*

These partial gleams of intelligence, directed in a peculiar way too, led many to discern the secret influence of her father. She still, however, pertina-nce at the inventions of this stercorarius cucullatus," as he calls him in his abominable Latin, as was at the mad pranks of Isabella, and the ridiculous personages of the court compelled to make on the subject. It is impossible to write a Jeremiad on the subject without a smile. See, in particular, his whimsical epistle to his old friend, the Archbishop of Granada, epist. cccxxxiii.

* Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. iii.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xxvi. xxxviii. liv. — Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Ximen. fol. 72. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 11.

ciously refused to sanction any measures of cortes for his recall, and when pressed by that body on this and other matters, at an audience which she granted before leaving Burgos, she plainly told them to "return to their quarters, and not to meddle further in the public business without her express commands." Not long after this, the legislature was prorogued by the royal council for four months.

The term assigned for the provisional government expired in December, and was not renewed. No other regency was appointed by the nobles ; and the kingdom without even the shadow of protection afforded by its cortes, and with no other guide but its crazy sovereign, was left to drift at random amidst the winds and waves of faction. This was not slow in gathering from every quarter, with the aid especially of the overgrown nobles, whose license on such occasions as this proved too plainly that public tranquillity was not founded so much on the stability of law, as on the personal character of the reigning sovereign.*

* Abarca, tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xvi.—P. Martyr, Op. Epist. ep. cccxvi.—Zurita, lib. vii. cap. xxxvi—xxxviii.—Zuñiga, An. al. de Sevil. año 1507.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccvi.

The Duke of Medina Sidonia, son of the nobleman who bore so honourable a part in the Granadine war, mustered a large force by land and sea for the recovery of his ancient patrimony of Gibraltar. — Isabella's high-spirited friend, the Marchioness of Moya, put herself at the head of a body of troops with better success, during her husband's illness, and reëstablished herself in the strong fortress of Segovia, which Philip had transferred to Manuel. (P. Martyr, epist. cccxliii.—Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. ccvii.) "No one lamented the circumstance," says Oviedo. The Marchioness closed her life not long after this,

The king's enemies, in the mean time, were pressing their correspondence with the Emperor Maximilian, and urging his immediate presence in Spain. Others devised schemes for marrying the poor queen to the young Duke of Calabria, or some other prince whose years or incapacity might enable them to act over again the farce of King Philip. To add to the troubles occasioned by this mesh of intrigue and faction, the country, which of late years had suffered from scarcity, was visited by a pestilence that fell most heavily on the south. In Seville alone, Bernaldez reports the incredible number of 30,000 persons to have fallen victims to it.*

But although the storm was thus darkening from every quarter, there was no general explosion, to shake the state to its foundations, as in the time of Henry IV. Orderly habits, if not principles, had been gradually formed under the long reign of Isabella. The great mass of the people had learned to respect the operation, and appreciate the benefits of law ; and notwithstanding the menacing attitude, the bustle, and transitory ebullitions of the rival factions, there seemed a manifest reluctance to break up the established order of things, and, by deeds of at about sixty years of age. Her husband, though much older, survived her. Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 1, dial. 23.

* Hist. de los Reyes Catol. MS. cap. ccviii. — Alv. Gomecius, fol. lxxi. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. ii.

The worthy curate of los Palacios does not vouch for this exact amount from his own knowledge. He states, however, that 170 died, out of his own little parish of 500 persons, and he narrowly escaped with life himself, after a severe attack. Ubi supra.

violence and bloodshed, to renew the days of ancient anarchy.

Much of this good result was undoubtedly to be attributed to the vigorous counsels and conduct of Ximenes,* who, together with the grand constable and the Duke of Alva, had received full powers from Ferdinand to act in his name. Much is also to be ascribed to the politic conduct of the king. Far from an intemperate zeal to resume the sceptre of Castile, he had shown throughout a discreet forbearance. He used the most courteous and condescending style in his communications to the nobles and the municipalities, expressing his entire confidence in their patriotism, and their loyalty to the queen, his daughter. Through the archbishop, and other important agents, he had taken effectual measures to soften the opposition of the more considerable lords; until at length not only such accommodating statesmen as Garcilasso de la Vega, but more sturdy opponents, as Villena, Benavente, and Bejar, were brought to give in their adhesion to their old master. Liberal promises, indeed, had been made by the emperor, in

* Ximenes equipped and paid out of his own funds a strong corps, under the ostensible purpose of protecting the queen's person, but quite as much to enforce order by checking the turbulent spirit of the grandees; a stretch of authority which this haughty body could ill brook. (Robles, cap. xvii.) Zurita, indeed, who thinks the archbishop had a strong relish for sovereign power, accuses him of being "at heart much more of a king than a friar." (Tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xxix.) Gomez, on the contrary, traces every political act of his to the purest patriotism. (Fol. 70, et alib.) In the mixed motives of action, Ximenes might probably have been puzzled himself to determine how much belonged to one principle, and how much to the other.

the name of his grandson Charles, who had already been made to assume the title of King of Castile. But the promises of the imperial braggart passed lightly with the more considerate Castilians, who knew how far they usually outstripped his performance, and who felt, on the other hand, that their true interests were connected with those of a prince whose superior talents and personal relations all concurred to recommend him to the seat he had once so honourably occupied. The great mass of the common people, too, notwithstanding the temporary alienation of their feelings from the Catholic king by his recent marriage, were driven by the evils they actually suffered, and the vague apprehension of greater, to participate in the same sentiments ; so that, in less than eight months from Philip's death, the whole nation may be said to have returned to its allegiance to its ancient sovereign. The only considerable exceptions were Don Juan Manuel and the Duke de Najara ; the former of whom had gone too far to recede, and the latter possessed too chivalrous or too stubborn a temper to do so. *

At length the Catholic monarch, having completed his arrangements at Naples, and waited until the affairs of Castile were fully ripe for his return, set sail from his Italian capital, June 4th, 1507. He proposed to touch at the Genoese port of Savona, where an interview had been arranged between him and Louis XII. During his residence in Naples, he had assiduously devoted himself to the affairs of the kingdom. He had avoided entering into the local politics of Italy, refusing all treaties and alliances proposed to him by its various states, whether offensive or defensive. He had evaded the importunate solicitations and remonstrances of Maximilian in regard to the Castilian regency; declining, moreover, a personal conference proposed to him by the emperor during his stay in Italy. After the great work of restoring the Angevins to their estates, he had thoroughly reorganized the interior administration of the kingdom; creating new offices, and entirely new departments. He made large reforms, moreover, in the courts of law, and prepared the way for the new system, demanded by its relations, as a dependency of the Spanish monarchy. Lastly, before leaving the city, he acceded to the request of the inhabitants for the reëstablishment of their ancient university.*

* P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccli.—L. M. Siculo, fol. clxxxvii.—Lanuza, tom. i. lib. i. cap. xxi.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. xix. xxii. xxv. xxx. xxxix.—

Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. tom. iv. p. 76 ; ed. Milano, 1803.—Robles, Vida de Xim. cap. xvii.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 12.

In all these sagacious measures he had been ably assisted by his viceroy Gonsalvo de Cordova. Ferdinand's deportment towards the latter had been due Sicilie, tom. iv. p. 84; 2nd ed.

* Giannone, Storia di Nap. lib. xxx. cap. i—v.—Summonte, tom. iv. lib. vi. cap. v. — L. M. Siculo, fol. 187. — Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 129.—Bernaldez, MS. c. ccx.—Signorelli, Coltura nelle

The learned Neapolitan civilian Giannone bears emphatic testimony to the general excellence of the Spanish legislation for Naples. Loc. cit.

studied, as I have said, to efface every uncomfortable impression from his mind. On his first arrival, indeed, the king had condescended to listen to complaints, made by certain officers of the exchequer, of Gonsalvo's waste and misapplication of the public monies. The general simply asked leave to produce his own accounts in his defence. The first item, which he read aloud, was 200,736 ducats, given in alms to the monasteries and the poor, to secure their prayers for the success of the king's enterprise. The second was 700,494 ducats to the spies employed in his service. Other charges equally preposterous followed; while some of the audience stared incredulous, others laughed, and the king himself, ashamed of the paltry part he was playing, dismissed the whole affair as a jest. The common saying of the cuentas del Gran Capitan, at this day, attests at least the popular faith in the anecdote.*

From this moment, Ferdinand continued to show Gonsalvo unbounded marks of confidence; advising with him on all important matters, and making him the only channel of royal favour. He again renewed, in the most emphatic manner, his promise to resign the Grand Mastership of St. Jago in his favour, on their return to Spain, and made formal application to the pope to confirm it.† In addition to the

* P. Jovius Vitæ Illustr. Vir. p. 102.—Chronica del Gran Capitan, lib. iii.

† Machiavelli expresses his astonishment that Gonsalvo should be the dupe of promises, the very princely honours already conferred on Gonsalvo, he granted him the noble duchy of Sessa, by an instrument which, after a pompous recapitulation of his stately titles and manifold services, declares that these latter were too great for recompense.* Unfortunately for both king and subject, this was too true.†

Gonsalvo remained a day or two behind his royal magnitude of which made them suspicious. “Ho sentito ragionare di questo accordo fra Consalvo e il Re, e maravigliarsi ciascuno che Consalvo se ne fidi; e quanto quel Re e stato piu liberale verso di lui, tantopiu ne insospettisce la brigata, pensando che il Re abbi fatto per assicurarlo, e per poterne meglio disporre sotto questo sicurtà.” (Legazione ii. a Roma, let. xxiii. Oct. 6th.) But what alternative had he, unless indeed that of open rebellion, for which he seems to have had no relish? And if he had, it was too late after Ferdinand was in Naples.

* Chronica del Gran Capitan, lib. iii. cap. iii.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. cap. vi. xlix.—P. Jovius, Vitæ Ill. Viror. p. 279.

“Vos el ilustre Don Gonzalo Hernandez de Cordoba,” begins the instrument, “Duque de Terra Nova, Marques de Santangelo y Vitonto, y mi Condestable del reyno de Napoles, nuestro muy charo y muy amado primo, y uno del nuestro secreto Consejo,” &c. &c. See the document ap. Quintana, Vi-das, tom. i. Apend. No. 1.) The revenues from his various estates amounted to 40,000 ducats. Zurita speaks of another instrument, a public manifesto of the Catholic king, proclaiming to the world his sense of his general's exalted services, and unimpeachable loyalty. (Anal. tom. vi. lib. viii. cap. iii.) This sort of testimony seems to contain an implication not very flattering, and on the whole is so improbable, that I cannot but think the Aragonese historian has confounded it with the grant of Sessa, bearing precisely the same date, Feb. 25th, and containing also, though incidentally, and as a thing of course, the most ample tribute to the Great Captain.

† Tacitus may explain why. “Beneficia eò usque læta sunt, dum videntur exsolvi posse; ubi multum antevenere, pro gratiâ odium redditur.” (Annales, lib. iv. sec. xviii.) “Il n'est pas si dangereux,” says Rochefoucault, in a more caustic vein, “de faire du mal à la plûpart des hommes, que de leur faire trop de bien.”

master in Naples, to settle his private affairs. In addition to the heavy debts incurred by his own generous style of living, he had assumed those of many of his old companions in arms, with whom the world had gone less prosperously than with himself. The claims of his creditors, therefore, had swollen to such an amount, that, in order to satisfy them fully, he was driven to sacrifice part of the domains lately granted him. Having discharged all the obligations of a man of honour, he prepared to quit the land over which he had ruled with so much splendour and renown for nearly four years. The Neapolitans in a body followed him to the vessel; and nobles, cavaliers, and even ladies of the highest rank lingered on the shore to bid him a last adieu. Not a dry eye, says the historian, was to be seen. So completely had he dazzled their imaginations, and captivated their hearts, by his brilliant and popular manners, his munificent spirit, and the equity of his administration, forming certainly far juster, if not surer claims to admiration, than the blood-stained trophies of military success. He was succeeded in the office of grand constable of the kingdom by Prospero Colonna, and in that of viceroy by the Count of Ribagorza, Ferdinand's nephew.*

On the 28th of June, the royal fleet of Aragon entered the little port of Savona, where the King of

* P. Jovius Vitæ, pp. 280, 281.—Garibay, tom. ii. lib. xx. cap. ix. — Giannone, Istor. lib. xxx. cap. i. — Summonte, tom.

iv. lib. vi. cap. v.—Guicciardini, tom. iv. p. lxxii.—Chronica del Gr. Cap. lib. iii. cap. iv.

France had already been waiting it several days. The French navy was ordered out to receive the Catholic monarch; and the vessels on either side, gaily decorated with the national flags and ensigns, rivalled each other in the beauty and magnificence of their equipments. King Ferdinand's galleys were spread with rich carpets and awnings of yellow and scarlet, and every sailor in the fleet exhibited the same gaudy-coloured livery of the royal house of Aragon. Louis XII. came to welcome his illustrious guests, attended by a gallant train of his nobility and chivalry; and in order to reciprocate, as far as possible, the confidence reposed in him by the monarch with whom he had been so recently at deadly feud, immediately went on board the vessel of the latter.* Horses and mules richly caparisoned awaited them at the landing. The French king, mounting his steed, gallantly placed the young Queen of Aragon behind him. His cavaliers did the same with the ladies of her suite, most of them French women, though attired, as an old chronicler of the nation rather peevishly complains, after the Spanish fashion; and the whole party, with the la vita propria in arbitrio dell' altro con non minore confidenza, che se sempre fossero stati concordissimi fratelli.” (Istor. d'Ital. tom. iv. p. 75.) This astonishment of the Italian is an indifferent tribute to the habitual good faith of the times.

* “Spettacolo certamente memorabile, vedere insieme due Re potentissimi tra tutti i Principi Cristiani, stati poco innanzi sì acerbissimi inimici, non solo riconciliati, e congiunti di parentado, ma deposti i segni dell' odio, e della memoria delle offese, commettere ciascuno di loro

ladies en croupe, galloped off to the royal quarters in Savona.*

Blithe and jocund were the revels which rung through the halls of this fair city during the brief residence of its royal visitors. Abundance of good cheer had been provided by Louis's orders, writes an old cavalier,† who was there to profit by it; and the larders of Savona were filled with the choicest game, and its cellars well stored with the delicious wines of Corsica, Languedoc, and Provence. Among the followers of Louis were the Marquis of Mantua, the brave La Palice, the veteran D'Aubigny, and many others of renown, who had so lately measured swords with the Spaniards on the fields of Italy, and who now vied with each other in rendering them these more grateful, and no less honourable, offices of chivalry.‡

* Auton, Hist. de Louis XII. Part iii. chap. xxxviii. — Buonaccorsi, p. 132. — St. Gelais, p. 204.

Germaine appears to have been no great favourite with the French chroniclers. "Et y estoit sa femme Germaine de Fouez, qui tenoit une merveilleuse audace. Elle fist peu de compte de tous les François, mesmement de son frere, le gentil Duc de Nemours." (Mém. de Bayard, chap. xxvii. ap. Coll. des Mém. Fr. tom. xv.) See also Fleurange, (chap. xix. ap. Coll. des Mém. tom. xvi.) who notices the same arrogant bearing.

† For fighting, and feasting, and all the generous pastimes of chivalry, none of the old French chroniclers of this time rivals Auton. He is the very Froissart of the sixteenth century. A part of his works still remains in manuscript. That which is printed retains the same form, I believe, in which it was given to the public by Godefroy in the beginning of the seventeenth century, while many an inferior chronicler and memoir-monger has been published and republished with all the lights of editorial erudition.

‡ J. d'Auton, P. iii. chap. xxxviii. — Bernaldez, MS. ubi

As the gallant D'Aubigny was confined to his apartment by the gout, Ferdinand, who had always held his talents and conduct in high esteem, complimented him by a visit in person. But no one excited such general interest and attention as Gonsalvo de Cordova, who was emphatically the hero of the day; at least, such is the testimony of Guicciardini, who will not be suspected of any undue partiality. Many a Frenchman there had had bitter experience of his military prowess. Many others had grown familiar with his exploits in the exaggerated reports of their countrymen. They had been taught to regard him with mingled feelings of fear and hatred, and could scarcely credit their senses as they beheld the bugbear of their imaginations distinguished above all others for "the majesty of his presence, the polished elegance of his discourse, and manners in which dignity was blended with grace." *

But none were so open in their admiration as King Louis. At his request, Gonsalvo was admitted to sup at the same table with his royal guests and

sup.—Bembo, Istor. Viniz. lib. vii.—St. Gelais, p. 204.

* Istoria d'Ital. tom. iv. pp. 76, 77.—P. Jovius, Vitæ Illust. Vir. p. 282.—Chron. del Gran Cap. lib. iii. cap. iv.

"Ma non dava minore materia ai ragionamenti il Gran Capitano, al quale non erano meno volti gli occhi degli uomini per la fama del suo valore, e per la memoria di tante vittorie, la quale faceva, chi i Franzesi, ancora che vinti tante volte di lui, e che solevano avere in sommo odio e orrore il suo nome, non si saziassero di contemplarlo e onorarlo. * * * * E accresceva l'ammirazione degli uomini la maestà eccellente della presenza sua, la magnificenza delle parole, i gesti, e la maniera piena di gravità condita di grazia: ma sopra tutti il Re di Francia," &c. &c. Guicciardini, ubi sup.

himself. During the repast he surveyed his illustrious guest with the deepest interest, asking him various particulars respecting those memorable campaigns which had proved so fatal to France. To all these the Great Captain responded with becoming gravity, says the chronicler; and the French monarch testified his satisfaction, at parting, by taking a massive chain of exquisite workmanship from his own neck, and throwing it round Gonsalvo's. The historians of the event appear to be entirely overwhelmed with the magnitude of the honour conferred on the Great Captain by thus admitting him to the same table with three crowned heads; and Guicciardini does not hesitate to pronounce it a more glorious epoch in his life than even that of his triumphal entry into the capital of Naples.*

During this interview, the monarchs held repeated conferences, at which none were present but the papal envoy, and Louis's favourite minister D'Amboise. The subject of discussion can only be conjectured by the subsequent proceedings, which make it probable it related to Italy; and that it was in this season of idle dalliance and festivity that the two princes, who held the destinies of that country in their hands, matured the famous league of Cambray, so disastrous to Venice, and reflecting little credit on its projectors, either on the score of good faith or sound policy. But to this we shall have occasion to return hereafter.*

* Brantôme, Vies des Hommes Illust. Disc. vi. — Chronica del Gr. Cap. lib. iii. cap. iv. — Guicciardini, tom. iv. pp. 77, 78. — Auton, ubi sup. — Quinta-

na, Español. Celeb. tom. i. p. 319. — Mém. de Bayard, chap. xxvii. ap. Mém. Franç. tom. xv. — Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccx.

At length, after enjoying for four days the splendid hospitality of their royal entertainer, the King and Queen of Aragon reëmbarked, and reached their own port of Valencia, after various detentions, on the 20th of July 1507. Ferdinand, having rested a short time in his beautiful capital, pressed forward to Castile, where his presence was eagerly expected. On the borders he was met by the Dukes of Albuquerque and Medina Celi, his faithful follower the Count de Cifuentes, and many other nobles and cavaliers. He was soon after joined by deputies from many of the principal cities in the kingdom, and thus escorted made his entry into it by the way of Monteagudo, on the 21st of August. How different from the forlorn and outcast condition in which he had quitted the country a short year before! He intimated the change in his own circumstances, by the greater state and show of authority which he now assumed. The residue of the old Italian army, just arrived under the celebrated Pedro Navarro, Count de Oliveto,† preceded him on the march; and he was personally attended by his alcaldes, al-

* J. d'Auton, Hist. de Louis XII. P. iii. ch. xxxviii.—Buonaccorsi, Diario, p. 133.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 36.

† King Ferdinand had granted him the title and territory of

Oliveto in the kingdom of Naples, in recompense for his eminent services in the Italian wars. Aleson, Anales de Navarra, tom. v. p. 178.—Jovius, Illust. Virorum, p. 190.

guacils, and kings-at-arms, with all the appropriate insignia of royal supremacy.*

At Tortoles he was met by the queen his daughter, accompanied by Archbishop Ximenes. The interview between them had more of pain than pleasure in it. The king was greatly shocked by Joanna's appearance ; for her wild and haggard features, emaciated figure, and the mean, squalid attire in which she was dressed, made it difficult to recognise any trace of the daughter from whom he had been so long separated. She discovered more sensibility on seeing him than she had shown since her husband's death, and henceforth resigned herself to her father's will with little opposition. She was soon after induced by him to change her unsuitable residence for more commodious quarters at Tordesillas. Her husband's remains were laid in the monastery of Santa Clara, adjoining the palace, from whose windows she could behold his sepulchre. From this period, although she survived forty-seven years, she never quitted the walls of her habitation. And although her name appeared jointly with that of her son, Charles V, in all public acts, she never afterwards could be induced to sign a paper, or take part in any transactions of a public nature. She lingered out a half century of dreary existence, as completely dead to the world as the remains which slept in the monastery of Santa Clara beside her.†

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccx.— Zurita, tom. vi. lib. viii. cap. iv.
vii.—P. Martyr, ep. ccclviii.—

Alv. Gomecius, fol. 74.—Oviedo's
MS. Bat. quinc. 3,^o dial. 9.

† A. Gomecius, fol. 75.—

From this time the Catholic king exercised an authority nearly as undisputed, and far less limited and defined than in the days of Isabella. So firm did he feel in his seat, indeed, that he omitted to obtain the constitutional warrant of cortes. He had greatly desired this at the late irregular meeting of that body; but it broke up, as we have seen, without effecting any thing, and indeed the disaffection of Burgos and some other principal cities, at that time, must have made the success of such an application quite doubtful. But the general cordiality with which Ferdinand was greeted, gave no ground for apprehending such a result at present.

Many, indeed, of his partisans objected to any intervention of the legislature in this matter as superfluous, alleging that he held the regency as natural guardian of his daughter, nominated, moreover, by the queen's will, and confirmed by the cortes at Toro. These rights, they argued, were not disturbed by his resignation, which was a compulsory act, and had never received any express legislative sanction; and which, in any event, must be considered as intended only for Philip's lifetime, and to be necessarily determined with that.

But, however plausible these views, the irregularity

Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccclxiii.—Zurita, Anal. lib. viii. cap. xlix.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 13.

Philip's remains were afterwards removed to the cathedral church of Granada, where they were deposited, together with those of his wife Joanna, in a magnificent sepulchre erected by Charles V. near that of Ferdinand and Isabella. Pedraza, Antigüedad. de Granada, lib. iii. c. vii.—Colmenar, Delices d'Espagne, tom. iii. p. 490.

of Ferdinand's proceedings furnished an argument for disobedience on the part of discontented nobles, who maintained that they knew no supreme authority but that of their Queen Joanna, till some other had been sanctioned by the legislature. The whole affair was finally settled, with more attention to constitutional forms, in the cortes held at Madrid, October 6th, 1510, when the king took the regular oaths as administrator of the realm in his daughter's name, and as guardian of her son.*

Ferdinand's deportment, on his first return, was distinguished by a most gracious clemency, evinced not so much, indeed, by any excessive remuneration of services, as by the politic oblivion of injuries. If he ever alluded to these, it was in a sportive way, implying there was no rancour or ill-will at heart. "Who would have thought," he exclaimed one day to a courtier near him, "that you could abandon so

* Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vii. c. xxvi. xxxiv.; lib. ix. c. xx.

See the bold language of the protest of the Marquis de Priego against this assumption of the regency by the Catholic king. "En caso tan grande," he says, "que se trata de gobernacion de grandes reynos é señoríos, justa é razonable cosa fuera é sería que fuéramos llamados é certificados de ello, porque yo é los otros caballeros, grandes é las ciudades é alcaldes mayores vieramos lo que debiamos hacer é consentir como vasallos é leales servidores de la reina nuestra señora, porque la administracion é gobernacion destos reynos se diera é concediera à quien las leyes destos reynos mandan que se den é encomienden en caso," &c. (MS. de la Biblioteca de la Real Acad. de Hist. ap. Marina, Teoría, tom. ii. P. ii. c. xviii.) Marina, however, is not justified in regarding Ferdinand's subsequent convocation of cortes for this purpose as a concession to the demands of the nation. (Teoría, loc. cit.) It was the result of the treaty with Maximilian, guaranteed by Louis XII. of Blois, the object of which was to secure the succession to the Archduke Charles. Zurita, lib. viii. c. xlvii.

easily your old master, for one so young and inexperienced?"—"Who would have thought," replied the other with equal bluntness, "that my old master would have outlived my young one?"*

With all this complaisance, however, the king did not neglect precautions for placing his authority on a sure basis, and fencing it round so as to screen it effectually from the insults to which it had been formerly exposed. He retained in pay most of the old Italian levies, with the ostensible purpose of an African expedition. He took good care that the military orders should hold their troops in constant readiness, and that the militia of the kingdom should be in condition for instant service. He formed a body guard to attend the royal person on all occasions. It consisted at first of only two hundred men, armed and drilled after the fashion of the Swiss ordonnance, and placed under the command of his chronicler Ayora, an experienced martinet, who made some figure at the defence of Salsas. This institution was probably immediately suggested by the garde du corps of Louis XII. at Savona, which, altogether on a more formidable scale, indeed, had excited his admiration by the magnificence of its appointments and thorough discipline.†

* P. Jovius, Vitæ Ill. Viror. p. 282.—Chron. del Gr. Capitan, lib. iii. cap. iv.

† Zurita, tom. vi. lib. viii. cap. x.—MSS. de Torres y de Oviedo, ap. Mem. de Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. vi.—Auton, P. iii. chap. xxxviii.

The Catholic king was very minute in his inquiries, according to Auton, "du faict et del estat des gardes du Roy, et de ses gentilshommes, qu'il reputoit à grande chose, et triomphale ordonnance." Ubi supra.

Notwithstanding the king's general popularity, there were still a few considerable persons who regarded his resumption of authority with an evil eye. Of these, Don Juan Manuel had fled the kingdom before his approach, and taken refuge at the court of Maximilian, where the counsellors of that monarch took good care that he should not acquire the ascendancy he had obtained over Philip. The Duke de Najara, however, still remained in Castile, shutting himself up in his fortresses, and refusing all compromise or obedience. The king, without hesitation, commanded Navarro to march against him with his whole force. Najara was persuaded by his friends to tender his submission, without waiting the encounter; and he surrendered his strongholds to the king, who, after detaining them some time in his keeping, delivered them over to the duke's eldest son.*

With another offender he dealt more sternly. This was Don Pedro de Cordova, Marquis de Priego, who, the reader may remember, when quite a boy, narrowly escaped the bloody fate of his father, Alonso de Aguilar, in the fatal slaughter of the Sierra Vermeja. This nobleman, in common with some other Andalusian lords, had taken umbrage at the little estimation and favour shown them, as they conceived, by Ferdinand, in comparison with the nobles of the north; and his temerity went so far as not only to obstruct the proceedings of one of the royal officers, sent to Cordova to inquire into recent disturbances there, but to imprison him in the dungeons of his castle of Montilla.

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccx.— 75.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. viii.
P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cap. xv.
xclxiii. — Alv. Gomecius, fol.

This outrage on the person of his own servant exasperated the king beyond all bounds. He resolved at once to make such an example of the offender as should strike terror into the disaffected nobles, and shield the royal authority from the repetition of similar indignities. As the marquis was one of the most potent and extensively allied grandees in the kingdom, Ferdinand made his preparations on a formidable scale, ordering, in addition to the regular troops, a levy of all between the ages of twenty and seventy throughout Andalusia. Priego's friends, alarmed at these signs of the gathering tempest, besought him to avert it, if possible, by instant concession ; and his uncle, the Great Captain, urged this most emphatically, as the only way of escaping utter ruin.

The rash young man, finding himself likely to receive no support in the unequal contest, accepted the counsel, and hastened to Toledo, to throw himself at the king's feet. The indignant monarch, however, would not admit him into his presence, but ordered him to deliver up his fortresses, and to remove to the distance of five leagues from the court. The Great Captain soon after sent the king an inventory of his nephew's castles and estates, at the same time deprecating his wrath, in consideration of the youth and inexperience of the offender.

Ferdinand, however, without heeding this, went on with his preparations, and having completed them, September 1508, advanced rapidly to the south. When arrived at Cordova, he ordered the imprisonment of the marquis. A formal process was then instituted against him before the royal council, on the charge of high treason. He made no defence, but threw himself on the mercy of his sovereign. The court declared he had incurred the penalty of death; but that the king, in consideration of his submission, was graciously pleased to commute this for a fine of 20,000,000 mrs., perpetual banishment from Cordova and its district, and the delivery of his fortresses into the royal keeping, with the entire demolition of the offending castle of Montilla. This last, famous as the birth-place of the Great Captain, was one of the strongest and most beautiful buildings in all Andalusia.* Sentence of death was at the same time pronounced against several cavaliers, and other inferior persons, concerned in the affair, and was immediately executed.

The Castilian aristocracy, alarmed and disgusted

* "Montiliana," writes Peter Martyr, "illa atria, quæ vidisti aliquando, multo auro, multoque ebore compta ornataque, proh dolor! funditus dirui sunt jussa." (Ep. cccv.) He was well acquainted with the lordly halls of Montilla, for he had been preceptor to their young master, who was a favourite pupil, to judge from the bitter wailings of the kind-hearted pedagogue over his fate. See epist. ccciv. cccv.

by the severity of a sentence which struck down one of the most considerable of their order, were open in their remonstrances to the king, beseeching him, if no other consideration moved him in favour of the young nobleman, to grant something to the distinguished services of his father and his uncle. The latter, as well as the Grand Constable Velasco, who enjoyed the highest consideration at court, were equally pressing in their solicitations. Ferdinand, however, was inexorable; and the sentence was executed. The nobles chafed in vain; although the constable expostulated with the king in a tone which no subject in Europe but a Castilian grandee would have ventured to assume. Gonsalvo coolly remarked, "It was crime enough in Don Pedro to be related to me."*

This illustrious man had good reason to feel before this that his credit at court was on the wane. On his return to Spain he was received with unbounded enthusiasm by the nation. He was detained by illness a few days behind the court, and his journey towards Burgos to rejoin it, on his recovery, was a triumphal procession the whole way. The roads were thronged with multitudes so numerous, that accommodations could scarcely be found for them in the towns on the route;† for they came

* Cura de los Palacios, MS. cap. ccxv. — Pet. Martyr, ep. cccxcii. cccxciii. ccccv. — P. Jovius, Vitæ, p. 284. — Zurita, tom. vi. lib. viii. cap. xx. xxi. xxii. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1507. — Garibay, tom. ii.

lib. xx. cap. x. — Chron. del Gran Capit. lib. iii. cap. vi. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 13.

† P. Jovius, Vitæ Illust. Virorum, p. 282.

from the remotest parts of the country, all eager to catch a glimpse of the hero whose name and exploits, the theme of story and of song, were familiar to the meanest peasant in Castile. In this way he made his entry into Burgos, amid the cheering acclamations of the people, and attended by a cortège of officers, who pompously displayed on their own persons, and the caparisons of their steeds, the rich spoils of Italian conquests. The old Count de Ureña, his friend, who, with the whole court, came out by Ferdinand's orders to receive him, exclaimed with a prophetic sigh, as he saw the splendid pageant come sweeping by, "This gallant ship, I fear, will require deeper water to ride in than she will find in Castile!"*

Ferdinand showed his usual gracious manners in his reception of Gonsalvo. It was not long, however, before the latter found that this was all he was to expect. No allusion was made to the grand-mastership. When it was at length brought before the king, and he was reminded of his promises, he contrived to defer their performance under various pretexts; until, at length, it became too apparent it was his intention to evade them altogether.

While the Great Captain and his friends were filled with an indignation at this duplicity, which they could ill suppress, a circumstance occurred to increase the coldness arising in Ferdinand's mind towards his injured subject. This was the proposed marriage (a marriage which, from whatever cause, never took place,)* of Gonsalvo's daughter Elvira to his friend the Constable of Castile.† Ferdinand had designed to secure her large inheritance to his own family, by an alliance with his grandson Juan de Aragon, son of the Archbishop of Saragossa. His displeasure at finding himself crossed in this was further sharpened by the petulant spirit of his young queen. The constable, now a widower, had been formerly married to a natural daughter of Ferdinand. Queen Germaine, adverting to his intended union with the lady Elvira, unceremoniously asked him, "If he did not feel it a degradation to accept the hand of a subject, after having wedded the daughter of a king?"—"How can I feel it so," he replied, alluding to the king's marriage with her, "when so

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccx.—P. Jovius, Vitæ Ill. Viror. loc. cit.—Chronica, lib. iii. cap. v.

* Quintana errs in stating that Doña Elvira married the constable. (Espanoles Celebres, tom. i. p. 321.) He had two wives, Doña Blanca de Herrera, and Doña Juana de Aragon, and at his death was laid by their side in the church of Santa Clara de Medina del Pomar. (Salazar, Dignidades de Castilla, lib. iii. cap. xxi.) Elvira married the Conde de Cabra. Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 42.

† Bernardino de Velasco, Grand Constable of Castile, as he was called par excellence, succeeded in 1492 to that dignity, which became hereditary in his family. He was third Count of Haro, and was created by the Catholic sovereigns, for his distinguished services, Duke of Frias. He had large estates, chiefly in Old Castile, with a yearly revenue, according to L. Marinæo, of 60,000 ducats. He appears to have possessed many noble and brilliant qualities, accompanied, however, with a haughtiness which made him feared rather than loved. He died Feb. 1512, after a few hours' illness, as appears by a letter of P. Martyr. Opus Epist. cccclxxix. — Dignidades de Castilla, ubi supra. — L. M. Siculo, fol. 23.

illustrious an example has been set me!" Germaine, who certainly could not boast the magnanimity of her predecessor, was so stung with the retort, that she not only never forgave the constable, but extended her petty resentment to Gonsalvo, who saw the Duke of Alva from this time installed in the honours he had before exclusively enjoyed, of immediate attendance on her royal person whenever she appeared in public.*

However indifferent Gonsalvo may have been to the little mortifications inflicted by female spleen, he could not endure longer his residence at a court where he had lost all consideration with the sovereign, and experienced nothing but duplicity and base ingratitude. He obtained leave, without difficulty, to withdraw to his own estates; where, not long after, the king, as if to make some amends for the gross violation of his promises, granted him the royal city of Loja, not many leagues from Granada. It was given to him for life; and Ferdinand had the effrontery to propose, as a condition of making the grant perpetual to his heirs, that Gonsalvo should relinquish his claim to the Grand-mastership of St. Jago. But the latter haughtily answered, "He would not give up the right of complaining of the injustice done him for the finest city in the king's dominions." †

* P. Jovius, Vita Magni Cons. pp. 282, 283.

† P. Jovius, Vitæ, pp. 284, 285.—Chron. del Gran Capitan, lib. iii. cap. vi.

From this time he remained on his estates in the south, chiefly at Loja, with an occasional residence in Granada, where he enjoyed the society of his old friend and military instructor, the Count de Tendilla. He found abundant occupation in schemes for improving the condition of his tenantry, and of the neighbouring districts. He took great interest in the fate of the unfortunate Moriscos, numerous in his quarter, whom he shielded as far as possible from the merciless grasp of the inquisition, while he supplied teachers and other enlightened means for converting or confirming them in a pure faith. He displayed the same magnificence and profuse hospitality in his living that he had always done. His house was visited by such intelligent foreigners as came to Spain, and by the most distinguished of his countrymen, especially the younger nobility and cavaliers, who resorted to it as the best school of highbred and knightly courtesy. He showed a lively curiosity in all that was going on abroad, keeping up his information by an extensive correspondence with agents, whom he regularly employed for the purpose, in the principal European courts. When the league of Cambray was adjusted, the King of France and the pope were desirous of giving him the command of the allied armies; but Ferdinand had injured him too sensibly to care to see him at the head of a military force again in Italy. He was as little desirous of employing him in public affairs at home, and suffered the remainder of his days to pass away in distant seclusion; a seclusion, however, not unpleasing to himself, nor unprofitable to others.* The world called it disgrace; and the old Count de Ureña exclaimed, “The good ship is stranded at last, as I predicted!”—“Not so,” said Gonsalvo, to whom the observation was reported; “she is still in excellent trim, and waits only the rising of the tide to bear away as bravely as ever.”†

* The inscription on Guicciardini’s monument might have been written on Gonsalvo’s.

“Cujus negotium, an otium gloriosius, incertum.”

See Pignotti, Storia della Toscana, tom. ix. p. 155.

† Quintana, Vidas, tom. i. pp. 322—334.—P. Jovius, Vitæ, p. 286.—Chronica, lib. iii. cap. vii—ix. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. Dlx. — Guicciardini, Ist. tom. iv. pp. 77, 78.

CHAPTER XXI.

XIMENES.—CONQUESTS IN AFRICA.—UNIVERSITY OF ALCALA.—POLYGLOT BIBLE.

1508—1510.

THE highhanded measures of Ferdinand, in regard to the Marquis of Priego and some other nobles, excited general disgust among the jealous aristocracy of Castile ; but they appear to have found more favour with the commons, who were probably not unwilling to see that haughty body humbled, which had so often trampled on the rights of its inferiors.* As a matter of policy, however, even with the nobles, this course does not seem to have been miscalculated ; since it showed that the king, whose talents they had always respected, was now possessed of power

* On his return from Cordova, he experienced a most loyal and enthusiastic reception from the ancient capital of Andalusia. The most interesting part of the pageant on this occasion was the troops of children, gaily dressed, who came out to meet him, presenting the keys of the city and an imperial crown ; after which the whole procession moved under thirteen triumphal arches, each inscribed with the name of one of his victories. For a description of these civic honours, see Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxvi. and Zuñiga, Anal. de Sevilla, año 1508.

to enforce obedience, and was fully resolved to exert it.

Indeed, notwithstanding a few deviations, it must be allowed that Ferdinand's conduct on his return was extremely lenient and liberal ; more especially, considering the subjects of provocation he had sustained in the personal insults and desertion of those on whom he had heaped so many favours. History affords few examples of similar moderation on the restoration of a banished prince, or party. In fact, a violent and tyrannical course would not have been agreeable to his character, in which passion, however strong by nature, was habitually subjected to reason. The present, as it would seem, excessive acts of severity are to be regarded, therefore, not as the sallies of personal resentment, but as the dictates of a calculating policy, intended to strike terror into the turbulent spirits whom fear only could hold in check.

To this energetic course he was stimulated, as was said, by the counsels of Ximenes. This eminent prelate had now reached the highest ecclesiastical honours short of the papacy. Soon after Ferdinand's restoration, he received a cardinal's hat from Pope Julius II ; * and this was followed by his appointment to the office of Inquisitor General of Castile, in the place of Deza, Archbishop of Seville. The important functions devolved on him by these offices, in conjunction with the primacy of Spain, might be supposed to furnish abundant subject and scope for his aspiring spirit. But his views, on the contrary, expanded with every step of his elevation, and now fell little short of those of an independent monarch. His zeal glowed fiercer than ever for the propagation of the Catholic faith. Had he lived in the age of the crusades, he would indubitably have headed one of those expeditions himself; for the spirit of the soldier burned strong and bright under his monastic weeds.* Indeed, like Columbus, he had formed plans for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre, even at this late day:† but his zeal found a better scope in a crusade against the neighbouring Moslems of Africa, who had retaliated the wrongs of Granada by repeated descents on the southern coasts of the peninsula, calling in vain for the interference of government. At the instigation, and with the aid of Ximenes, an expedition had been fitted out soon after

* He obtained this dignity at the king's solicitation, during his visit to Naples. See Ferdinand's letter, ap. Quintanilla, copied from the archives of Alcala. Apend. No. 15.

* “Ego tamen dum universas ejus actiones comparo,” says Alvaro Gomez, “magis ad bellica exercitia à naturâ effectum esse judico. Erat enim vir animi invicti et sublimis, omniaque in melius asserere conantis.” De Reb. Gest. Ximenii, fol. 95.

† From a letter of King Emanuel of Portugal, it appears that Ximenes had endeavoured to interest him, together with the Kings of Aragon and England, in a crusade to the Holy Land. There was much method in his madness, if we may judge from the careful survey he had procured of the coast, as well as his plan of operations. The Portuguese monarch praises in round terms the edifying zeal of the primate, but wisely confined himself to his own crusades in India, which were likely to make better returns, at least in this world, than those to Palestine. The letter is still preserved in the archives of Alcala; see a copy in Quintanilla, Apend. No. 16.

Isabella's death, (Sept. 13th, 1505,) which resulted in the capture of Mazarquivir, an important port, and formidable nest of pirates, on the Barbary coast, nearly opposite Carthagenæ. He now meditated a more difficult enterprise, the conquest of Oran.*

This place, situated about a league from the former, was one of the most considerable of the Moslem possessions in the Mediterranean, being a principal mart for the trade of the Levant. It contained about 20,000 inhabitants, was strongly fortified, and had acquired a degree of opulence by its extensive commerce, which enabled it to maintain a swarm of cruisers that swept this inland sea, and made fearful depredations on its populous borders.†

No sooner was Ferdinand quietly established again in the government, than Ximenes urged him to undertake this new conquest. The king saw its importance, but objected the want of funds. The cardinal, who was prepared for this, replied that "he was ready to loan whatever sums were necessary, and to take sole charge of the expedition, leading it, if the king pleased, in person." Ferdinand, who had no objection to this mode of making acquisitions, more especially as it would open a vent for the turbulent spirits of his subjects, readily acquiesced in the proposition.

* Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. xv. — Alv. Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Xim. fol. 77. — Robles, Vida del Card. Cisneros, cap. xvii. — Galindez de Carbajal, Anal. MS. año 1507. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxviii. cap. xv.; lib. xxix. cap. ix.

† P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccccxviii.

The enterprise, however disproportionate it might seem to the resources of a private individual, was not beyond those of the cardinal. He had been carefully husbanding his revenues for some time past, with a view to this object; although he had occasionally broken in upon his appropriations, in order to redeem unfortunate Spaniards who had been swept into slavery. He had obtained accurate surveys of the Barbary coast from an Italian engineer named Vianelli. He had advised, as to the best mode of conducting operations, with his friend Gonsalvo de Cordova, to whom, if it had been the king's pleasure, he would gladly have intrusted the conduct of the expedition. At his suggestion, that post was now assigned to the celebrated engineer, Count Pedro Navarro.*

No time was lost in completing the requisite preparations. Besides the Italian veterans, levies were drawn from all quarters of the country, and especially the cardinal's own diocese. The chapter of Toledo entered heartily into his views, furnishing liberal supplies, and offering to accompany the expedition in person. An ample train of ordnance was procured, with provisions and military stores for the maintenance of an army four months. Before the close of spring, 1509, all was in readiness, and a fleet of ten galleys and eighty smaller vessels rode in the harbour of Carthagená, having on board a force amounting in all to 4,000 horse and 10,000 foot. Such were the resources, activity, and energy, displayed by a man whose life, until within a very few years, had been spent in cloistered solitudes and the quiet practices of religion, and who now, oppressed with infirmities more than usual, had passed the seventieth year of his age.

* Alv. Gomecius, fol. 96— —P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. 100. — Bernaldez, Hist. MS. ccccxiii. — Chronica del Gran cap. ccxviii.—Robles, cap. xvii. Capitan, lib. iii. cap. vii.

In accomplishing all this, the cardinal had experienced greater obstacles than those arising from bodily infirmity or age. His plans had been constantly discouraged and thwarted by the nobles, who derided the idea of "a monk fighting the battles of Spain, while the Great Captain was left to stay at home, and count his beads like a hermit." The soldiers, especially those of Italy, as well as their commander Navarro, trained under the banners of Gonsalvo, showed little inclination to serve under their spiritual leader. The king himself was cooled by these various manifestations of discontent. But the storm, which prostrates the weaker spirit, serves only to root the stronger more firmly in its purpose; and the genius of Ximenes, rising with the obstacles it had to encounter, finally succeeded in triumphing over all, in reconciling the king, disappointing the nobles, and restoring obedience and discipline to the army.*

On the 16th of May 1509, the fleet weighed

* A. Gomecius, fol. 100—102.—Robles, ubi sup. — Quintanilla. Vida de Cisneros, lib.

iii. cap. xix. — Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxviii.

anchor, and on the following evening at sunset reached the African port of Mazarquivir. No time was lost in disembarking, for the fires on the hill-tops showed that the country was already in alarm. It was proposed to direct the main attack against a lofty height, or ridge of land, rising between Mazarquivir and Oran, so near the latter as entirely to command it. At the same time, the fleet was to drop down before the Moorish city, and, by opening a brisk cannonade, divert the attention of the inhabitants from the principal point of assault.

As soon as the Spanish army had landed, and formed in order of battle, Ximenes mounted his mule, and rode along the ranks. He was dressed in his pontifical robes, with a belted sword at his side. A Franciscan friar rode before him, bearing aloft the massive silver cross, the archiepiscopal standard of Toledo. Around him were other brethren of the order, wearing their monastic frocks, with scimitars hanging from their girdles. As the ghostly cavalcade advanced, they raised the triumphant hymn of Vexilla Regis, until at length the cardinal, ascending a rising ground, imposed silence, and made a brief but animated harangue to his soldiers. He reminded them of the wrongs they had suffered from the Moslems, the devastation of their coasts, and their brethren dragged into merciless slavery. When he had sufficiently roused their resentment against the enemies of their country and religion, he stimulated their cupidity by dwelling on the golden spoil which awaited them in the opulent city of Oran ; and he concluded his discourse with declaring, that he had come to peril his own life in the good cause of the cross, and lead them on to battle, as his predecessors had often done before him.*

The venerable aspect and heart-stirring eloquence of the primate kindled a deep, reverential enthusiasm in the bosoms of his martial audience, which showed itself in the profoundest silence. The officers, however, closed around him at the conclusion of the address, and besought him not to expose his sacred person to the hazard of the fight ; reminding him, that his presence would probably do more harm than good, by drawing off the attention of the men to his personal safety. This last consideration moved the cardinal, who, though reluctantly, consented to relinquish the command to Navarro, and, after uttering his parting benediction over the prostrate ranks, he withdrew to the neighbouring fortress of Mazarquivir.

The day was now far spent, and dark clouds of the enemy were seen gathering along the tops of the sierra, which it was proposed first to attack. Navarro, seeing this post so strongly occupied, doubted whether his men would be able to carry it before nightfall, if indeed at all, without previous rest and refreshment, after the exhausting labours of the day.

* Bernaldez, Hist. MS. ubi
sup.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. viii.
cap. xxx.—Gomecius, fol. 108.

— Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS.
dial. de Xim.

He returned, therefore, to Mazarquivir, to take counsel of Ximenes. The latter, whom he found at his devotions, besought him "not to falter at this hour, but to go forward in God's name, since both the blessed Saviour and the false prophet Mahomet conspired to deliver the enemy into his hands." The soldier's scruples vanished before the intrepid bearing of the prelate, and, returning to the army, he gave instant orders to advance.*

May 18. Slowly and silently the Spanish troops began their ascent up the steep sides of the sierra, under the friendly cover of a thick mist, which, rolling heavily down the skirts of the hills, shielded them for a time from the eye of the enemy. As soon as they emerged from it, however, they were saluted with showers of balls, arrows, and other deadly missiles, followed by the desperate charges of the Moors, who, rushing down, endeavoured to drive back the assailants. But they made no impression on the long pikes and deep ranks of the latter, which remained unshaken as a rock. Still the numbers of the enemy, fully equal to those of the Spaniards, and the advantages of their position, enabled them to dispute the ground with fearful obstinacy. At length, Navarro got a small battery of heavy guns to operate on the flank of the Moors. The effect of this movement was soon visible. The exposed sides of the Moslêm column, finding no shelter from the deadly volleys, were shaken and thrown into disorder. The confusion extended to the leading files, which now, pressed heavily by the iron array of spearmen in the Christian van, began to give ground. Retreat was soon quickened into a disorderly flight. The Spaniards pursued; many of them, especially the raw levies, breaking their ranks, and following up the flying foe without the least regard to the commands or menaces of their officers; a circumstance which might have proved fatal, had the Moors had strength or discipline to rally. As it was, the scattered numbers of the Christians, magnifying to the eye their real force, served only to increase the panic, and accelerate the speed of the fugitives.*

* A. Gomecius, fol. 108 — xix. — Zurita, lib. viii. cap. 110. — Quintanilla, lib. iii. cap. xxx.

While this was going on, the fleet had anchored before the city, and opened a very heavy cannonade, which was answered with equal spirit from sixty pieces of artillery which garnished the fortifications. The troops on board, however, made good their landing, and soon joined themselves to their victorious countrymen descending from the sierra. They then pushed forward in all haste towards Oran, proposing to carry the place by escalade. They were poorly provided with ladders, but the desperate energy of the moment overleaped every obstacle; and planting their long pikes against the walls, or thrusting them in the crevices of the stones, they clambered up with incredible dexterity, although they were utterly unable to repeat the feat the next day in cold blood. The first who gained the summit was Sousa, captain of the cardinal's guard, who, shouting forth "St. Jago and Ximenes," unfurled his colours, emblazoned with the primate's arms on one side, and the cross on the other, and planted them on the battlements. Six other banners were soon seen streaming from the ramparts, and the soldiers leaping into the town got possession of the gates, and threw them open to their comrades. The whole army now rushed in, sweeping every thing before it. Some few of the Moors endeavoured to make head against the tide, but most fled into the houses and mosques for protection. Resistance and flight were alike unavailing. No mercy was shown; no respect for age or sex; and the soldiery abandoned themselves to all the brutal license and ferocity which seem to stain religious wars above every other. It was in vain Navarro called them off. They returned like bloodhounds to the slaughter, and never slackened, till at last wearied with butchery, and gorged with the food and wine found in the houses, they sunk down to sleep promiscuously in the streets and public squares.*

* P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccccxviii.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxviii. — Alv. Gomecius, De

Reb. Gest. Ximen. fol. 110, 111. — Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xviii.

The sun, which on the preceding morning had shed its rays on Oran flourishing in all the pride of commercial opulence, and teeming with a free and industrious population, next rose on it a captive city, with its ferocious conquerors stretched in slumber on the heaps of their slaughtered victims.* No less than four thousand Moors were said to have fallen in the battle, and from five to eight thousand were made prisoners. The loss of the Christians was inconsiderable. As soon as the Spanish commander had taken the necessary measures for cleansing the place from its foul and dismal impurities, he sent to the cardinal, and invited him to take possession of it. The latter embarked on board his galley, and as he coasted along the margin of the city, and saw its gay pavilions and sparkling minarets reflected in the waters, his soul swelled with satisfaction at the glorious acquisition he had made for Christian Spain. It seemed incredible, that a town so strongly manned and fortified should have been carried so easily.

* A. Gomecius, ubi supra.— Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxviii. — Robles, cap. xxii. — P. Martyr, ubi supra.—Quintanilla, lib. iii. cap. xix. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1509. — Quincuagenas de Oviedo, MS.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 15.

As Ximenes landed, and entered the gates, attended by his train of monkish brethren, he was hailed with thundering acclamations by the army as the true victor of Oran, in whose behalf Heaven had condescended to repeat the stupendous miracle of Joshua, by stopping the sun in his career.† But the

* “Sed tandem somnus ex labore et vino obortus eos oppressit, et cruentis hostium cadaveribus tantâ securitate et fiducia indormierunt, ut permulti in Oranis urbis plateis ad multam diem stertuerint.” Gomecius, De Reb. Gest. Xim. fol. 111.

† To accommodate the Christians, as the day was far advanced when the action began, the sun was permitted to stand still several hours; there is some discrepancy as to the precise number; most authorities, however, make it four. There is no miracle in the whole Roman cardinal, humbly disclaiming all merits of his own, was heard to repeat aloud the sublime language of the psalmist, "Non nobis, Domine, non nobis," while he gave his benedictions to the soldiery. He was then conducted to the alcazar, and the keys of the fortress were put into his hand. The spoil of the captured city, amounting, as was said, to half a million of gold ducats, the fruit of long successful trade and piracy, was placed at his disposal for distribution: but that which gave most joy to his heart was the liberation of three hundred Christian captives, who were languishing in the dungeons of Oran. A few hours after the surrender, the mezuar of Tremecen arrived with a powerful reinforcement to its relief; but instantly retreated on learning the tidings. Fortunate, indeed, was it that the battle had not been deferred to the succeeding day. This, which must be wholly ascribed to Ximenes, was by most referred to direct inspiration. Quite as probable an explanation may be found in the boldness and impetuous enthusiasm of the cardinal's character.*

Catholic budget better vouched than this. It is recorded by four eye-witnesses, men of learning and character. It is attested, moreover, by a cloud of witnesses, who depose to have received it, some from tradition, others from direct communication with their ancestors present in the action; and who all agree that it was matter of public notoriety and belief at the time. See the whole formidable array of evidence set forth by Quintanilla, (p. 236, et seq. and Apend. p. 103.) It was scarcely to have been expected that so astounding a miracle should escape the notice of all Europe, where it must have been as apparent as at Oran. This universal silence may be thought, indeed, the greater miracle of the two.

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. cccviii. — Robles, cap. xxii. — A. Gomecius, fol. 113. — Lanuza, Hist.

The conquest of Oran opened unbounded scope to the ambition of Ximenes, who saw in imagination the banner of the Cross floating triumphant from the walls of every Moslêm city on the Mediterranean. He experienced, however, serious impediments to his further progress. Navarro, accustomed to an independent command, chafed in his present subordinate situation, especially under a spiritual leader whose military science he justly held in contempt. He was a rude, unlettered soldier, and bluntly spoke his mind to the primate. He told him, "His commission under him terminated with the capture of Oran; that two generals were too many in one army; that the cardinal should rest contented with the laurels he had already won, and, instead of playing the king, go home to his flock, and leave fighting to those to whom the trade belonged."*

But what troubled the prelate more than this insolence of his general, was a letter which fell into his hands, addressed by the king to Count Navarro, in which he requested him to be sure to find some pretence for detaining the cardinal in Africa as long as his presence could be made any way serviceable. Ximenes had good reason before to feel that the royal favour to him flowed from selfishness rather than any personal regard. The king had always wished the archbishopric of Toledo for his favourite, de Arag. tom. i. lib. i. cap. xxii.

—Quincuagenas de Oviedo, MS.
—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V.
tom. i. p. 15.

* Fléchier, Histoire du Card. Ximenes, pp. 308, 309.—Abarca, Reyes de Arag. tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xviii.

and natural son, Alphonso of Aragon. After his return from Naples, he importuned Ximenes to resign his see, and exchange it with that of Saragossa, held by Alphonso ; till at length the indignant prelate replied, " That he would never consent to barter away the dignities of the church ; that if his highness pressed him any further, he would indeed throw up the primacy, but it should be to bury himself in the friar's cell from which the queen had originally called him." Ferdinand, who, independent of the odium of such a proceeding, could ill afford to part with so able a minister, knew his inflexible temper too well ever to resume the subject.*

With some reason, therefore, for distrusting the good will of his sovereign, Ximenes put the worst possible construction on the expressions in his letter. He saw himself a mere tool in Ferdinand's hands, to be used so long as occasion might serve, with the utmost indifference to his own interests or convenience. These humiliating suspicions, together with the arrogant bearing of his general, disgusted him with the further prosecution of the expedition, while he was confirmed in his purpose of returning to Spain, and found an obvious apology for it in the state of his own health, too infirm to encounter, with safety, the wasting heats of an African summer.

* P. Jovius, Vita Magni Gons. lib. iii. p. 107. — Alv. Gomecius, fol. 117. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 16. — "The worthy brother," says Sandoval, of the prelate, "thought his archbishopric worth more than the good graces of a covetous old monarch."

Before his departure he summoned Navarro and his officers about him, and, after giving them much good counsel respecting the government and defence of their new acquisitions, he placed at their disposal an ample supply of funds and stores, for the maintenance of the army several months. He then embarked, May 22nd, not with the pompous array and circumstance of a hero returning from his conquests, but with a few domestics only, in an unarmed galley; showing, as it were, by this very act, the good effects of his enterprise, in the security which it brought to the before perilous navigation of these inland seas.*

Splendid preparations were made for his reception in Spain, and he was invited to visit the court at Valladolid, to receive the homage and public testimonials due to his eminent services. But his ambition was of too noble a kind to be dazzled by the false lights of an ephemeral popularity. He had too much pride of character, indeed, to allow room for the indulgence of vanity. He declined these compliments, and hastened without loss of time to his favourite city of Alcala. There too the citizens, anxious to do him honour, turned out under arms to receive him, and made a breach in the walls, that he might make his entry in a style worthy of a conqueror. But this also he declined, choosing to pass into the town by the regular avenue, with no peculiar circumstance attending his entrance, save only a small train of camels, led by African slaves, and laden with gold and silver plate from the mosques of Oran, and a precious collection of Arabian manuscripts for the library of his infant university of Alcala.

* P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cxviii. — Quintanilla, lib. iii. ccccx. — Alv. Gomecius, fol. cap. xx.

He showed similar modesty and simplicity in his deportment and conversation. He made no allusion to the stirring scenes in which he had been so gloriously engaged; and, if others made any, turned the discourse into some other channel, particularly to the condition of his college, its discipline, and literary progress, which, with the great project for the publication of his famous polyglot Bible, seemed now almost wholly to absorb his attention.*

His first care, however, was to visit the families in his diocese, and minister consolation and relief, which he did in the most benevolent manner, to those who were suffering from the loss of friends, whether by death or absence, in the late campaign. Nor did he in his academical retreat lose sight of the great object which had so deeply interested him, of extending the empire of the Cross over Africa. From time to time he remitted supplies for the maintenance of Oran; and he lost no opportunity of stimulating Ferdinand to prosecute his conquests.

The Catholic king, however, felt too sensibly the importance of his new possessions to require such ad-

* Quintanilla, lib. iii. cap. xx. —Zurita, tom. vi. lib. viii. cap. —Alv. Gomecius, fol. 119, 120. xxx.—Robles, cap. xxii.

munition ; and Count Pedro Navarro was furnished with ample resources of every kind, and, above all, with the veterans formed under the eye of Gonsalvo de Cordova. Thus placed on an independent field of conquest, the Spanish general was not slow in pushing his advantages. His first enterprise was against Bugia, January 13th, 1510, whose king, at the head of a powerful army, he routed in two pitched battles, and got possession of his flourishing capital, January 31st. Algiers, Tennez, Tremecen, and other cities on the Barbary coast, submitted one after another to the Spanish arms. The inhabitants were received as vassals of the Catholic king, engaging to pay the taxes usually imposed by their Moslem princes, and to serve him in war, with the addition of the whimsical provision, so often found in the old Granadine treaties, to attend him in cortes. They guaranteed, moreover, the liberation of all Christian captives in their dominions; for which the Algerines, however, took care to indemnify themselves by extorting the full ransom from their Jewish residents. It was of little moment to the wretched Israelite which party won the day, Christian or Mussulman; he was sure to be stripped in either case.*

On the 26th of July 1510, the ancient city of

* Zurita, tom. vi. lib. ix. ap. i. ii. iv. xiii. — P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccccxxxv—ccccxxvii. — Quintanilla, lib. ii. cap. xx.—Mariana, lib. xxix.

cap.xxii.—Alv.Gomecius,fol.122—124.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxii. — Zurita gives at length the capitulation with Algiers; lib. ix. cap. xiii.

Tripoli, after a most bloody and desperate defence, surrendered to the arms of the victorious general, whose name had now become terrible along the whole northern borders of Africa. In the following month, however, August 28th, he met with a serious discomfiture in the island of Gelves, where four thousand of his men were slain and made prisoners.* This check in the brilliant career of Count Navarro, put a final stop to the progress of the Castilian arms in Africa under Ferdinand.†

* Chénier, Recherches Histor. sur les Maures, tom. ii. pp. 355, 356.—It is but just to state that this disaster was imputable to Don Garcia de Toledo, who had charge of the expedition, and who expiated his temerity with his life. He was eldest son of the old Duke of Alva, and father of that nobleman, who subsequently acquired such gloomy celebrity by his conquests and cruelties in the Netherlands. The tender poet, Garcilasso de la Vega, offers sweet incense to the house of Toledo, in one of his pastorals, in which he mourns over the disastrous day of Gelves;

“ O patria lagrimosa, i como buelves
los ojos a los Gelves sospirando !”

The death of the young nobleman is veiled under a beautiful simile, which challenges comparison with the great masters of Latin and Italian song, from whom the Castilian bard derived it.

“ Puso en el duro suelo la hermosa
cara, como la rosa matutina, cuando ya el sol declina l medio dia ;
que pierde su alegria, i marchitando
va la color mudando ; o en el campo
cual queda el lirio blanco, qu’ el arado
crudamente cortado al pas-sar dexa ;
del cual aun no s’ alexa pressuroso
aquel color hermosa, o se destierra ;
mas ya la madre tierra descuidada, no l’ administra nada de su aliento, qu’ era el sustentamiento
i vigor suyo ;
tal està el rostro tuyo en el arena, fresca rosa, açucena blanca
i pura.”

Obras de Garcilasso ; ed. de Herrera, pp. 507, 508.

† The reader may feel some

The results already obtained, however, were of great importance, whether we consider the value of the acquisitions, being some of the most opulent marts on the Barbary coast, or the security gained for commerce, by sweeping the Mediterranean of the pestilent hordes of marauders which had so long infested it. Most of the new conquests escaped from the Spanish crown in later times, through the imbecility or indolence of Ferdinand's successors. The conquests of Ximenes, however, were placed in so strong a posture of defence, as to resist every attempt for their recovery by the enemy, and to remain permanently incorporated with the Spanish empire.*

curiosity respecting the fate of Count Pedro Navarro. He soon after this went to Italy, where he held a high command, and maintained his reputation in the wars of that country, until he was taken by the French in the great battle of Ravenna. Through the carelessness or coldness of Ferdinand he was permitted to languish in captivity, till he took his revenge by enlisting in the service of the French monarch. Before doing this, however, he resigned his Neapolitan estates, and formally renounced his allegiance to the Catholic king; of whom, being a Navarrese by birth, he was not a native subject. He unfortunately fell into the hands of his own countrymen in one of the subsequent actions in Italy, and was imprisoned at Naples, in Castel Nuovo, which he had himself formerly gained from the French. Here he soon after died, if we are to believe Brantôme, being privately despatched by command of Charles V; other writers intimate, by his own hand. His remains, first deposited in an obscure corner of the church of Sta. Maria, were afterwards removed to the chapel of the great Gonsalvo, and a superb mausoleum was erected over them by the Prince of Sessa, grandson of the hero. Gomecius, fol. 124.—Aleson, Anales de Navarra, tom. v. pp. 226. 289. 406.—Brantôme, Vies des Hommes Illustres, Disc. ix. — P. Jovius, Vitæ Illust. Viror. pp. 190 — 193.

* Ximenes continued to watch over the city he had so valiantly won, long after his death. He

This illustrious prelate, in the mean while, was busily occupied, in his retirement at Alcala de Henares, with watching over the interests and rapid developement of his infant university. This institution was too important in itself, and exercised too large an influence over the intellectual progress of the country, to pass unnoticed in a history of the present reign.

As far back as 1497, Ximenes had conceived the idea of establishing an university in the ancient town of Alcala, where the salubrity of the air, and the sober, tranquil complexion of the scenery, on the beautiful borders of the Henares, seemed well suited never failed to be present in seasons of extraordinary peril. At least, the gaunt, gigantic figure of a monk, dressed in the robes of his order, and wearing a cardinal's hat, was seen sometimes stalking along the battlements at midnight, and at others, mounted on a white charger and brandishing a naked sword in the thick of the fight. His last appearance was in 1648, when Oran was closely beleaguered by the Algerines. A sentinel on duty saw a figure moving along the parapet one clear moonlight night, dressed in a Franciscan frock, with a general's baton in his hand. As soon as it was hailed by the terrified soldier, it called to him to "tell the garrison to be of good heart, for the enemy should not prevail against them." Having uttered these words, the apparition vanished without ceremony. It repeated its visit in the same manner on the following night; and, a few days after, its assurance was verified by the total discomfiture of the Algerines in a bloody battle under the walls. See the evidence of these various apparitions, as collected, for the edification of the court of Rome, by that prince of miracle-mongers, Quintanilla, (pp. 317. 335. 338. 340.) Bishop Fléchier repeats these old wives' tales as if he really believed them. (Hist. de Ximenes, liv. vi.)

Oran, after resisting repeated assaults by the Moors, was at length so much damaged by an earthquake, in 1790, that it was abandoned, and its Spanish garrison and population were transferred to the neighbouring city of Mazarquivir.

to academic study and meditation. He even went so far as to obtain plans at this time for his buildings from a celebrated architect. Other engagements, however, postponed the commencement of the work till 1500, when the cardinal laid the corner-stone of the principal college himself, with a solemn ceremonial,* and invocation of the blessing of Heaven on his designs. From that hour, amidst all the engrossing cares of church and state, he never lost sight of this great object. When at Alcala, he might be frequently seen on the ground, with the rule in his hand, taking the admeasurements of the buildings, and stimulating the industry of the workmen by seasonable rewards.†

The plans were too extensive, however, to admit of being speedily accomplished. Besides the principal college of San Ildefonso, named in honour of the patron saint of Toledo, there were nine others, together with a hospital for the reception of invalids at the university. These edifices were built in the most substantial manner; and such parts as admitted of it, as the libraries, refectories, and chapels, were finished with elegance, and even splendour. The city of Alcala underwent many important and expensive alterations, in order to render it more worthy of

* The custom, familiar at the present day, of depositing coins and other tokens, with inscriptions bearing the names of the architect and founder and date of the building, under the cornerstone, was observed on this occasion, where it is noticed as of ancient usage, more prisco. Gomecius, fol. 28.

† Fléchier, Histoire du Card. Ximenes, p. 597; ed. 1693.

being the seat of a great and flourishing university. The stagnant water was carried off by drains, the streets were paved, old buildings removed, and new and spacious avenues thrown open.*

At the expiration of eight years, the cardinal had the satisfaction of seeing the whole of his vast design completed, and every apartment of the spacious pile carefully furnished with all that was requisite for the comfort and accommodation of the student. It was, indeed, a noble enterprise, more particularly when viewed as the work of a private individual. As such it raised the deepest admiration in Francis I, when he visited the spot, a few years after the cardinal's death. "Your Ximenes," said he, "has executed more than I should have dared to conceive; he has done with his single hand what in France it has cost a line of kings to accomplish."†

The erection of the buildings, however, did not terminate the labours of the primate, who now assumed the task of digesting a scheme of instruction and discipline for his infant seminary. In doing this he sought light wherever it was to be found; and borrowed many useful hints from the venerable univer-

* Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS.
—Robles, Compendio de la Vida, cap. xvi. — Quintanilla, p. 178.
—Colmenar, Delices d'Espagne, tom. ii. pp. 308—310.—Navigiero, Viaggio in Spagna, fol. 7, —who notices particularly the library, "piena di molti libri et Latini et Greci et Hebraici."

The good people accused the cardinal of too great a passion for building; and punningly said, "The church of Toledo had never had a bishop of greater edification, in every sense, than Ximenes." Flé- chier, p. 597.

Alv. Gomeciu s, fol. 79.

sity of Paris. His system was of the most enlightened kind, being directed to call all the powers of the student into action, and not leave him a mere passive recipient in the hands of his teachers. Besides daily recitations and lectures, he was required to take part in public examinations and discussions, so conducted as to prove effectually his talent and acquisitions. In these gladiatorial displays Ximenes took the deepest interest, and often encouraged the generous emulation of the scholar by attending in person.

Two provisions may be noticed as characteristic of the man. One, that the salary of a professor should be regulated by the number of his disciples. Another, that every professor should be reëligible at the expiration of every four years. It was impossible that any servant of Ximenes should sleep on his post.*

Liberal foundations were made for indigent students, especially in divinity. Indeed, theological studies, or rather such a general course of study as should properly enter into the education of a Christian minister, was the avowed object of the institution; for the Spanish clergy up to this period, as before noticed, were too often deficient in the most common elements of learning; but, in this preparatory discipline, the comprehensive mind of Ximenes embraced nearly the whole circle of sciences taught in other universities. Out of the forty-two chairs, indeed, twelve only were dedicated to divinity and the canon law ; while fourteen were appropriated to grammar, rhetoric, and the ancient classics ; studies, which probably found especial favour with the cardinal, as furnishing the only keys to a correct criticism and interpretation of the Scriptures.*

* Alv. Gomecius, fol. 82 — 84.

Having completed his arrangements, the cardinal sought the most competent agents for carrying his plans into execution, and this indifferently from abroad and at home. His mind was too lofty for narrow local prejudices ; and the tree of knowledge, he knew, bore fruit in every clime.† He took especial care, that the emolument should be sufficient to tempt talent from obscurity, and from quarters, however remote, where it was to be found. In this he

* Navagiero says the cardinal left it more than 15,000 ducats income. (Viaggio, fol. 7.—Robles, Vida de Ximenes, cap. xvi.)

Of these professorships, six were appropriated to theology, six to canon law, four to medicine, one to anatomy, one to surgery, eight to the arts, as they were called, embracing logic, physics, and metaphysics, one to ethics, one to mathematics, four to the ancient languages, four to rhetoric, and six to grammar. One is struck with the disproportion of the mathematical studies to the rest. Though an important part of general education, and consequently of the course embraced in most universities, it had too little reference to a religious one, to find much favour with the cardinal.

† Lampillas, in his usual patriotic vein, stoutly maintains that the chairs of the university were all supplied by native Spaniards. "Trovó in Spagna," he says of the cardinal, "tutta quella scelta copia di grandi uomini, qual richiedeva la grande impresa," &c. (Letteratura Spagnuola, tom. i. P. ii. p. 160.) Alvaro Gomez, who flourished two centuries earlier, and personally knew the professors, is the better authority. Vida, fol. 80—82.

was perfectly successful, and we find the university catalogue at this time inscribed with the names of the most distinguished scholars in their various departments, many of whom we are enabled to appreciate by the enduring memorials of erudition which they have bequeathed to us.*

In July 1508, the cardinal received the welcome intelligence that his academy was opened for the admission of pupils; and in the following month, the first lecture, being on Aristotle's Ethics, was publicly delivered. Students soon flocked to the new university, attracted by the reputation of its professors, its ample apparatus, its thorough system of instruction, and, above all, its splendid patronage and the high character of its founder. We have no information of their number in Ximenes's lifetime; but it must have been very considerable, since no less than 7000 came out to receive Francis I. on his visit to the university, within twenty years after it was opened.†

Five years after this period, 1513, King Ferdinand, in an excursion made for the benefit of his declining health, paid a visit to Alcala. Ever since his return from Oran, the cardinal, disgusted with public life, had remained with a few brief exceptions in his own diocese, devoted solely to his personal and profes-

* L. Marinæo Siculo, Cosas Memor. fol. 13.

Alvaro Gomez knew several of these savans, whose scholarship (and he was a competent judge) he notices with liberal panegyric. De Rebus Gestis Ximen. fol. 80, et seq.

† Quintanilla, lib. iii. cap. xvii.

sional duties. It was with proud satisfaction that he now received his sovereign, and exhibited to him the noble testimony of the great objects to which his retirement had been consecrated. The king, whose naturally inquisitive mind no illness could damp, visited every part of the establishment, and attended the examinations, and listened to the public disputations of the scholars with interest. With little learning of his own, he had been made too often sensible of his deficiencies not to appreciate it in others. His acute perception readily discerned the immense benefit to his kingdom, and the glory conferred on his reign by the labours of his ancient minister, and he did ample justice to them in the unqualified terms of his commendation.

It was on this occasion that the rector of San Ildefonso, the head of the university, came out to receive the king, preceded by his usual train of attendants, with their maces or wands of office. The royal guard, at this exhibition, called out to them to lay aside these insignia, as unbecoming any subject in the presence of his sovereign. "Not so," said Ferdinand, who had the good sense to perceive that majesty could not be degraded by its homage to letters; "not so; this is the seat of the Muses, and those who are initiated in their mysteries have the best right to reign here." *

In the midst of his pressing duties Ximenes found

* A. Gomecius, fol. 86.

The reader will readily call to mind the familiar anecdote of King Charles and Dr. Busby.

time for the execution of another work, which would alone have been sufficient to render his name immortal in the republic of letters. This was his famous Bible, or Complutensian Polyglot, as usually termed, from the place where it was printed.* It was on the plan, first conceived by Origen, of exhibiting in one view the Scriptures in their various ancient languages. It was a work of surpassing difficulty, demanding an extensive and critical acquaintance with the most ancient, and consequently the rarest manuscripts. The character and station of the cardinal afforded him, it is true, uncommon facilities. The precious collection of the Vatican was liberally thrown open to him, especially under Leo X, whose munificent spirit delighted in the undertaking.† He obtained copies in like manner of whatever was of value in the other libraries of Italy, and indeed of Europe generally; and Spain supplied him with editions of the Old Testament of great antiquity, which had been treasured up by the banished Israelites.‡ Some

* “Alcala de Henares,” says Martyr in one of his early letters, “quæ dicitur esse Complutum. Sit, vel ne, nil mihi curæ.” (Ep. ccliv.) These irreverent doubts were uttered before it had gained its literary celebrity. L. Marinæo derives the name, Complutum, from the abundant fruitfulness of the soil—“cumplumiento que tiene de cada cosa.” Cosas Memor. fol. 13.

† Ximenes acknowledges his obligations to his holiness, in particular for the Greek MSS. “Atque ex ipsis (exemplariis) quidem Græca Sanctitati tuæ debemus; qui ex istâ Apostolicâ bibliothecâ antiquissimos tam Veteris quàm Novi codices perquam humanè ad nos misisti.” Bib. Comp. Prologo.

‡ “Maximam,” says the cardinal in his Preface, “laboris nostri partem in eo præcipue fuisse versatam; ut et virorum in linguarum cognitione eminenidea may be formed of his lavish expenditure in this way, from the fact that 4000 gold crowns were paid for seven foreign manuscripts, which, however, came too late to be of use in the compilation.*

The conduct of the work was intrusted to nine scholars, well skilled in the ancient tongues, as most of them had evinced by works of critical acuteness and erudition. After the labours of the day, these learned sages were accustomed to meet, in order to settle the doubts and difficulties which had arisen in the course of their researches, and, in short, to compare the results of their observations. Ximenes, who, however limited his attainments in general literature,† was an excellent biblical critic, frequently presided, and took a prominent part in these deliberations. “Lose no time, my friends,” he would say, “in the prosecution of our glorious work; lest, in the casualties of life, you should lose your patron, or I have to lament the loss of those whose services are of more price in my eyes than wealth and worldly honours.”‡ tissimorum operâ uteremur, et castigatissima omni ex parte vetustissimæque exemplaria pro archetypis haberemus; quorum quidem, tam Hebræorum quàm Græcorum ac Latinorum, multiplicem copiam, variis ex locis, non sine summo labore conquistivimus.” Prologo Bib. Complutensis.

* A. Gomecius, fol. 39. —
Quintanilla, lib. iii. c. x.

† Martyr speaks of Ximenes, in one of his epistles, as “doctrinâ singulari oppletum.” (Ep. cviii.) He speaks with more distrust in another, “Amit esse virum, si non literis, morum tamen sanctitate egregium.” (Ep. clx.) This was written some years later, when he had better knowledge of him.

‡ Quintanilla, lib. iii. cap. x.
—A. Gomecius, fol. 38.

The litterateurs employed in the compilation were the ves-

The difficulties of the undertaking were sensibly increased by those of the printing. The art was then in its infancy, and there were no types in Spain, if indeed in any part of Europe, in the Oriental character. Ximenes, however, careful to have the whole executed under his own eye, imported artists from Germany, and had types cast in the various languages required, in his foundries at Alcala.*

The work when completed occupied six volumes, folio ;† the four first devoted to the Old Testament, the fifth to the New ; the last contained a Hebrew and Chaldaic vocabulary, with other elementary treatises of singular labour and learning. It was not brought to an end till 1517, fifteen years after its commencement, and a few months only before the death of its illustrious projector. Alvaro Gomez relates that he had often heard John Broccario, the son of the printer,‡ say, that when the last sheet nable Nebrixa, the learned Nuñez, or Pinciano, of whom the reader has had some account ; Lopez de Zuñiga, a controversialist of Erasmus ; Bartholomeo de Castro, the famous Greek Demetrius Cretensis, and Juan de Vergara,—all thorough linguists, especially in the Greek and Latin. To these were joined Paulo Coronel, Alfonso a physician, and Alfonso Zamora, converted Jews, and familiar with the Oriental languages. Zamora has the merit of the philological compilations relative to the Hebrew and Chaldaic, in the last volume. Idem auct.

ut supra ; et Suma de la Vida del Cardenal Ximenes, MS.

* Quintanilla, lib. iii. cap. x.

† The work was originally put at the extremely low price of six ducats and a half a copy. (Præfix. Bib. Polyglot.) As only 600 copies, however, were struck off, it has become exceedingly rare and valuable. According to Brunet, it has sold as high as 63/.

‡ “Industriâ et solertiâ honorabilis viri Arnaldi Guillelmi de Brocario, artis impressoris Magistri. Anno Domini 1517. Julii die decimo.” Postscript to was struck off, he, then a child, was dressed in his best attire, and sent with a copy to the cardinal. The latter as he took it raised his eyes to Heaven, and devoutly offered up his thanks for being spared to the completion of this good work. Then turning to his friends who were present, he said, that "of all the acts which distinguished his administration there was none, however arduous, better entitled to their congratulation than this."*

This is not the place, if I were competent, to discuss the merits of this great work, the reputation of which is familiar to every scholar. Critics, indeed, have disputed the antiquity of the manuscripts used in the compilation, as well as the correctness and value of the emendations.† Unfortunately, the destruction of the original manuscripts, in a manner fourth and last part of Vetus Test.

* Alv. Gomecius, fol. 38.

The part devoted to the Old Testament contains the Hebrew original with the Latin Vulgate, the Septuagint version, and the Chaldaic paraphrase, with Latin translations by the Spanish scholars. The New Testament was printed in the original Greek, with the Vulgate of Jerome. After the completion of this work, the cardinal projected an edition of Aristotle on the same scale, which was unfortunately defeated by his death. Ibid. fol. 39.

† The principal controversy on this subject was carried on in Germany between Wetstein and Goeze; the former impugning, the latter defending the Complutensian Bible. The cautious and candid Michaelis, whose prepossessions appear to have been on the side of Goeze, decides ultimately, after his own examination, in favour of Wetstein, as regards the value of the MSS. employed; not, however, as relates to the grave charge of wilfully accommodating the Greek text to the Vulgate. See the grounds and merits of the controversy, ap. Marsh's Michaelis, Introd. to New Test. vol. ii. P. i. ch. xii. s. i. p. 2 notes.

h forms one of the most whimsical anecdotes in ry history, makes it impossible to settle the ion satisfactorily.* Undoubtedly, many blemmay be charged on it, necessarily incident to e when the science of criticism was imperfectly rstood, and the stock of materials was much limited, or at least more difficult of access, at the present day.† After every deduction, ver, the cardinal's Bible has the merit of being irst successful attempt at a polyglot version of criptures, and consequently of facilitating, even s errors, the execution of more perfect and later
 s of the kind: ‡ nor can we look at it in conn with the age, and the auspices under which rofessor Moldenhawer, of ny, visited Alcala, in for the interesting pur-of examining the MSS.

 n the Complutensian Po-

He there learned that ad all been disposed of, much waste paper (mem-inutiles), by the librarian
 t time, to a rocket-maker town, who soon worked up in the regular way of cation! He assigns no for doubting the truth of tory. The name of the an, unfortunately, is not ed. It would have been perishable as that of Omar.
 elis, (Marsh,) vol. ii. P. i.
 i. s. i. note.

'Accedit,' say the editors
 e Polyglot, adverting to unders of early transcribubicunque Latinorum codicum varietas est, aut depravavatæ lectionis suspitio, (id quod librariorum imperitiâ simul et negligentia frequentissimè accidere videmus,) ad primam Scripturæ originem recurrendum est." Prologo.

‡ Tiraboschi adduces a psal-ter published in four of the ancient tongues, at Genoa, in 1516, as the first essay of a polyglot version. (Letteratura Italiana, tom. viii. p. 191.)
 See also Lampillas, (Letteratura Spagnuola, tom. ii. P. ii. p. 290,) who does not fail to add this enormity to the black catalogue which he has mustered against the librarian of Modena. The three first vols. of the Complutensian Bible were printed before 1516, although the whole work did not pass the press till the following year.

it was accomplished, without regarding it as a noble monument of piety, learning, and munificence, which entitles its author to the gratitude of the whole Christian world.

Such were the gigantic projects which amused the leisure hours of this great prelate. Though gigantic, they were neither beyond his strength to execute, nor beyond the demands of his age and country. They were not like those works which, forced into being by whim, or transitory impulse, perish with the breath that made them; but, taking deep root, were cherished and invigorated by the national sentiment, so as to bear rich fruit for posterity. This was particularly the case with the institution at Alcala. It soon became the subject of royal and private benefaction. Its founder bequeathed it, at his death, a clear revenue of 14,000 ducats. By the middle of the seventeenth century, this had increased to 42,000, and the colleges multiplied from ten to thirty-five.*

The rising reputation of the new academy, which attracted students from every quarter of the peninsula to its halls, threatened to eclipse the glories of the ancient seminary at Salamanca, and occasioned bitter jealousies between them. The field of letters, however, was wide enough for both, especially as the one was more immediately devoted to theological

* Quintanilla, lib. iii. cap. xvii.—Quincuagenas de Oviedo, MS. dial. de Ximeni.

Ferdinand and Isabella conceded liberal grants and immunities to Alcala on more than one occasion. Gomecius, fol. 43. 45.

preparation, to the entire exclusion of civil jurisprudence, which formed a prominent branch of instruction at the other. In this state of things their rivalry, far from being productive of mischief, might be regarded as salutary, by quickening literary ardour, too prone to languish without the spur of competition. Side by side the sister universities went forward, dividing the public patronage and estimation. As long as the good era of letters lasted in Spain, the academy of Ximenes, under the influence of its admirable discipline, maintained a reputation inferior to none other in the peninsula,* and continued to send forth its sons to occupy the most exalted posts in church and state, and to shed the light of genius and science over their own and future ages.†

* Erasmus, in a letter to his friend Vergara, 1527, perpetrates a Greek pun on the classic name of Alcalá, intimating the highest opinion of the state of science there. "Gratulor tibi, ornatissime adolescens, gratulor vestræ Hispaniæ ad pristinam eruditionis laudem veluti postliminio reflorescenti. Gratulor Compluto, quod duorum præsulum Francisci et Alfonsi felicibus auspiciis sic ef-florescit omni genere studiorum, ut jure optimo παμπλουτον appellare possimus." Epistolæ; ed. 1642, p. 771.

† Quintanilla is for passing the sum total of the good works of these worthies of Alcalá to the credit of its founder. They might serve as a makeweight to turn the scale in favour of his beatification. Vida, lib. iii. cap. xvii.

CHAPTER XXII.

WARS AND POLITICS OF ITALY.

1508—1513.

THE domestic history of Spain, after Ferdinand's resumption of the regency, contains few remarkable events. Its foreign relations were more important. Those with Africa have been already noticed, and we must now turn to those with Italy and Navarre.

The possession of Naples necessarily brought Ferdinand within the sphere of Italian politics. He showed little disposition, however, to avail himself of it for the further extension of his conquests. Gonzalvo, indeed, during his administration, meditated various schemes for the overthrow of the French power in the peninsula, but with a view rather to the preservation than enlargement of his present acquisitions. After the treaty with Louis XII. even these designs were abandoned, and the Catholic monarch seemed wholly occupied with the internal affairs of his kingdom, and the establishment of his rising empire in Africa.*

* Guicciardini, Ist. d'Italia, tom. iii. lib. v. p. 257; ed. Milano, 1803.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. vi. cap. vii. ix. et alib.

The craving appetite of Louis XII, on the other hand, sharpened by the loss of Naples, sought to indemnify itself by more ample acquisitions in the north. As far back as 1504, he had arranged a plan with the emperor for the partition of the continental possessions of Venice, introducing it into one of those abortive treaties at Blois for the marriage of his daughter.* The scheme is said to have been communicated to Ferdinand in the royal interview at Savona. No immediate action followed, and it seems probable that the latter monarch, with his usual circumspection, reserved his decision until he should be more clearly satisfied of the advantages to himself.†

At length the projected partition was definitely settled, December 10th, 1508, by the celebrated treaty of Cambray, between Louis XII. and the Emperor Maximilian, in which the pope, King Ferdinand, and all princes who had any claims for spoliations by the Venetians, were invited to take part. The share of the spoil assigned to the Catholic monarch was the five Neapolitan cities, Trani, Brindisi, Gallipoli, Pulignano, and Otranto, pledged to Venice for considerable sums advanced by her during the late war.‡ The Spanish court, and, not long after, Julius II. ratified the treaty, although it was in direct contravention of the avowed purpose of the pontiff, to chase the barbarians from Italy. It was his bold policy, however, to make use of them first for the aggrandizement of the church, and then to trust to his augmented strength and more favourable opportunities for eradicating them altogether.

* Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. P. i. No. 30.—Flassan, Hist. de la Diplom. Franç. tom. i. pp. 282, 283.

† Guicciardini, tom. iv. p. 78.
‡ Flassan, tom. i. lib. ii. p. 283.—Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. Part i. No. 52.

Never was there a project more destitute of principle or sound policy. There was not one of the contracting parties who was not at that very time in close alliance with the state, the dismemberment of which he was plotting. As a matter of policy, it went to break down the principal barrier on which each of these powers could rely for keeping in check the overweening ambition of its neighbours, and maintaining the balance of Italy.* The alarm of Venice was quieted for a time by assurances from the courts of France and Spain, that the league was solely directed against the Turks, accompanied by the most hypocritical professions of good will, and amicable offers to the republic.†

The preamble of the treaty declares, that it being the intention of the allies to support the pope in a crusade against the infidel, they first proposed to recover from Venice the territories of which she had despoiled the church and other powers, to the manifest hindrance of these pious designs. The more

* This argument, used by Machiavelli against Louis's rupture with Venice, applies with more or less force to all the other allies. Opere, Il Principe, cap. iii.

† Hist. de la Ligue de Cambray, tom. i. pp. 66, 67.—Alf. de Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 36, 37.—Guicciardini, Istor. d'Ital. tom. iv. p. 141.—Bembo, Istor. Viniz. tom. ii. lib. vii.

flagitious the meditated enterprise, the deeper was the veil of hypocrisy thrown over it in this corrupt age. The true reasons for the confederacy are to be found in a speech delivered at the German diet, some time after, by the French minister Hélian. "We," he remarks, after enumerating various enormities of the republic, "we wear no fine purple; feast from no sumptuous services of plate; have no coffers overflowing with gold. We are barbarians. Surely," he continues in another place, "if it is derogatory to princes to act the part of merchants, it is unbecoming in merchants to assume the state of princes."* This, then, was the true key to the conspiracy against Venice; envy of her superior wealth and magnificence, hatred engendered by her too arrogant bearing, and lastly the evil eye with which kings naturally regard the movements of an active, aspiring republic.†

To secure the coöperation of Florence, the Kings

* See a liberal extract from this harangue, ap. Daru, Hist. de Venise, tom. iii. liv. xxiii. — Also ap. Du Bos, Hist. de la Ligue de Cambray, tom. i. p. 240, et seq. — The old poet Jean Marot sums up the sins of the republic in the following verse :

"Autre Dieu n'ont que l'or, c'est leur créance."

Œuvres de Jean et Clement Marot, tom. v. p. 71.

† See the undisguised satisfaction with which Martyr, a Milanese, predicts, (ep. ccccx.) and Guicciardini, a Florentine, records the humiliation of Venice. (Istoria, lib. iv. p. 137.) The arrogance of the rival republic does not escape the satirical lash of Machiavelli :

"San Marco, impetuoso ed
importuno, Credendosi haver sempre
il vento in poppa,
Non si curò di rovinare ognuno ;
Nè vidde come la potenza
troppa Era nociva."

Dell' Asino d'Oro, capit. v.

of France and Spain agreed to withdraw their protection from Pisa, for a stipulated sum of money. There is nothing in the whole history of the merchant princes of Venice so mercenary and base as this bartering away for gold the independence for which this little republic had been so nobly contending for more than fourteen years.*

Early in April 1509, Louis XII. crossed the Alps at the head of a force which bore down all opposition. City and castle fell before him; and his demeanour to the vanquished, over whom he had no rights beyond the ordinary ones of war, was that of an incensed master taking vengeance on his rebellious vassals. In revenge for his detention before Peschiera, he hung the Venetian governor and his son from the battlements. This was an outrage on the laws of chivalry, which, however hard they bore on the peasant, respected those of high degree. Louis's rank, and his heart it seems, unhappily raised him equally above sympathy with either class.†

* Mariana, Hist. lib. xxix. cap. xv.—Scip. Ammirato, Ist. Fiorentine, tom. iii. lib. xxviii. p. 286.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccccxiii.

Louis XII. was in alliance with Florence, but insisted on 100,000 ducats as the price of his acquiescence in her recovery of Pisa. Ferdinand, or rather his general Gonsalvo de Cordova, had taken Pisa under his protection, and the king insisted on 50,000 ducats for his abandonment of her. This honourable transaction resulted in the payment of the respective amounts to the royal jobbers; the 50,000 excess of Louis's portion being kept a profound secret from Ferdinand, who was made to believe by the parties, that his ally received only a like sum with himself. Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital. tom. iv. pp. 78. 80 156, 157.

† Mém. du Chev. Bayard, chap. xxx. — Mém. de Fleu-

On the 14th of May 1509, was fought the bloody battle of Agnadel, which broke the power of Venice, and at once decided the fate of the war.* Ferdinand had contributed nothing to these operations, except by his diversion on the side of Naples, where he possessed himself without difficulty of the cities allotted to his share. They were the cheapest, and, not the most valuable, were the most permanent acquisitions of the war, being reincorporated in the monarchy of Naples.

Then followed the memorable decree by which Venice released her continental provinces from their allegiance, authorizing them to provide in any way they could for their safety; a measure which, whether originating in panic or policy, was perfectly consonant with the latter.† The confederates, who ge, chap. viii.—Guicciardini, n. iv. p. 183.

Jean Marot describes the execution in the following cool and summary style:

“ Ce chastelain de là, aussi
le capitaine,
Pour la derrision et response
vilaine Qu’ils firent au hérault, furent pris et sanglez, Puis devant tout le monde pendus et estranglez.”

Œuvres, tom. v. p. 158.

* The fullest account, probably, of the action, is in the Journal de Venise of Jean Marot. (Œuvres, tom. v. pp. 124-139.) This pioneer of French history, since eclipsed by his more polished son, accompanied his master Louis XII. in the Italian expedition as his poet chronicler; and the subject has elicited occasionally some sparks of poetic fire, though struck out with a rude hand. The poem is so conscientious in its facts and dates, that it is commended by a French critic as the most exact record of the Italian campaign. Ibid. Remarques, p. 16; ed. 1731.

† Foreign historians impute this measure to the former motive, the Venetians to the latter. The cool and deliberate conduct of this government, from which all passion, to use the language of the Abbé Du Bos, seems to have been banished, may authorize our acquieshad remained united during the chase, soon quarrelled over the division of the spoil. Ancient jealousies revived. The republic, with cool and consummate diplomacy, availed herself of this state of feeling.

Pope Julius, who had gained all he proposed, and was satisfied with the humiliation of Venice, now felt all his former antipathies and distrust of the French return in full force. The rising flame was diligently fanned by the artful emissaries of the republic, who at length effected a reconciliation on her behalf with the haughty pontiff. The latter, having taken this direction, went forward in it with his usual impetuosity. He planned a new coalition for the expulsion of the French, calling on the other allies to take part in it. Louis retaliated by summoning a council to inquire into the pope's conduct, and by marching his troops into the territories of the church.*

May 21st, 1511. The advance of the French, who had now got possession of Bologna, alarmed Ferdinand. He had secured the objects for which he had entered into the war, and was loath to be diverted from enterprises in which he was interested nearer home. "I know not," writes Peter Martyr cence in the statement most flattering to the national vanity. See the discussion ap. Hist. de la Ligue de Cambray, p. 126, et seq. 4th ed.

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxi. — Mémoires de Fleurange, chap.

vii.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccccxvi.—Guicciardini, tom. iv. pp. 178, 179. 190, 191; tom. v. pp. 71. 82—86.—Bembo, Istor. Viniz. lib. vii. ix. x.

at this time, "what the king will decide on. He is intent on following up his African conquests. He feels natural reluctance at breaking with his French ally: but I do not well see how he can avoid supporting the pope and the church, not only as the cause of religion, but of freedom; for if the French get possession of Rome, the liberties of all Italy and of every state in Europe are in peril." *

The Catholic king viewed it in this light, and sent repeated and earnest remonstrances to Louis XII. against his aggressions on the church, beseeching him not to interrupt the peace of Christendom, and his own pious purpose, more particularly, of spreading the banners of the Cross over the infidel regions of Africa. The very sweet and fraternal tone of these communications filled the King of France, says Guicciardini, with much distrust of his royal brother; and he was heard to say, in allusion to the great preparations the latter was making by sea and land, "I am the Saracen against whom they are directed." †

* Opus Epist. ep. cccclxvi.—Mém. de Bayard, chap. xlvi.—Mém. de Fleurange, chap. xxvi.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxv.

† Istor. d'Italia, lib. ix. p. 135.—Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1511.—Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxv.—P. Martyr, eadem epist.

Machiavelli's friend Vettori, in one of his letters, speaks of the Catholic king as the principal author of the new coalition against France, and notices three hundred lances which he furnished the pope in advance for this purpose. (Opere di Machiavelli, Lett. Famigl. No. viii. ed. Genova, 1798.) He does not seem to understand that these lances were part of the services due for the fief of Naples. The letter, above quoted, of Martyr, a more competent and unsuspecting authority, shows Ferdinand's sincere aversion to a rupture with Louis at

To secure Ferdinand more to his interests, the pope granted him the investiture, so long withheld, of Naples, on the same easy terms that it was formerly held by the Aragonese line. His holiness further released him from the obligation of his marriage treaty, by which the moiety of Naples was to revert to the French crown in case of Germaine's dying without issue. This dispensing power of the successors of St. Peter, so convenient for princes in their good graces, is undoubtedly the severest tax ever levied by superstition on human reason.*

On the 4th of October 1511, a treaty was concluded between Julius II, Ferdinand, and Venice, with the avowed object of protecting the church,—in other words, driving the French out of Italy.†

the present juncture; and a subsequent passage of the same epistle shows him too much in earnest in his dissuasives, to be open to the charge of insincerity. “Quo speret evolaturam ejus animam, ut mitibus verbis ipsum, Reginam ejus uxorem, ut consiliarios omnes Cabanillas alloquatur, ut agant apud regem suum de pace, dat in frequentibus mandatis.” P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ubi supra.—See further, ep. ccccliv.

* Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. ccccxli.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. xxiv.—P. Jovius, Vitæ Illustr. Virorum, p. 164; ed. Basil. 1578.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 18.

The act of investiture was dated July 3, 1510. In the following August, the pontiff remitted the feudal services for the annual tribute of a white palfrey, and the aid of 300 lances when the estates of the church should be invaded. (Zurita, tom. vi. lib. ix. cap. xi.) The pope had hitherto refused the investiture, except on the most exorbitant terms; which so much disgusted Ferdinand, that he passed by Ostia on his return from Naples without condescending to meet his holiness, who was waiting there for a personal interview with him. P. Martyr, ep. cccliii.—Guicciardini, tom. iv. p. 73.

† Guicciardini, tom. v. lib. x. p. 207.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxx. c. v.—Rymer's Fœdera, tom. xiii. pp. 305—308.

From the pious purpose to which it was devoted, it was called the Holy League. The quota to be furnished by the King of Aragon was 1200 heavy, 1000 light cavalry, 10,000 foot, and a squadron of eleven galleys, to act in concert with the Venetian fleet. The combined forces were to be placed under the command of Hugo de Cardona, viceroy of Naples, a person of polished and engaging address, but without the resolution or experience requisite to military success. The rough old pope sarcastically nicknamed him "Lady Cardona." It was an appointment that would certainly have never been made by Queen Isabella. Indeed, the favour shown this nobleman on this and other occasions was so much beyond his deserts, as to raise a suspicion in many, that he was more nearly allied by blood to Ferdinand than usually imagined.*

Early in 1512, France, by great exertions and without a single confederate out of Italy, save the false and fluctuating emperor, got an army into the field superior to that of the allies in point of num-

* Guicciardini, Istoria, tom. v. lib. x. p. 208.—Bembo, Istor. Viniz. tom. ii. lib. xii.—Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxx. cap. v. xiv.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccclxxxiii.

Vettori, it seems, gave credence to the same suggestion. "Spagna ha sempre amato assai questo suo Vicere, e per errore che abbia fatto non l'ha gastigato, ma piu presto fatto piu grande, e si puo pensare, come molti dicono, che sia suo figlio, e che abbia in pensiero lasciarlo Re di Napoli." Opere di Machiavelli, Lett. di 16 Maggio, 1514.

According to Aleson, the king would have appointed Navarro to the post of commander-in-chief, had not his low birth disqualified him for it in the eyes of the allies. Anal. de Navarra, tom. v. lib. xxxv. c. xii.

bers, and still more so in the character of its commander. This was Gaston de Foix, Duke de Nemours, and brother of the Queen of Aragon. Though a boy in years, for he was but twenty-two, he was ripe in understanding, and possessed consummate military talents. He introduced a severer discipline into his army, and an entirely new system of tactics. He looked forward to his results with stern indifference to the means by which they were to be effected. He disregarded the difficulties of the roads, and the inclemency of the season, which had hitherto put a check on military operations. Through the midst of frightful morasses, or in the depth of winter snows, he performed his marches with a celerity unknown in the warfare of that age. After leaving Milan, in less than a fortnight he relieved Bologna, then besieged by the allies, Feb. 5th, made a countermarch on Brescia, defeated a detachment by the way, and the whole Venetian army under its walls, and on the same day of the latter event succeeded in carrying the place by storm. After a few weeks' dissipation of the carnival, he again put himself in motion, and descending on Ravenna succeeded in bringing the allied army to a decisive action under its walls. Ferdinand, well understanding the peculiar characters of the French and Spanish soldier, had cautioned his general to adopt the Fabian policy of Gonsalvo, and avoid a close encounter as long as possible.*

* Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxx. ccxxxi.—Guicciardini, Ist. d'Ital.

April 11th, 1512. This battle, fought with the greatest numbers, was also the most murderous which had stained the fair soil of Italy for a century. No less than eighteen or twenty thousand, according to authentic accounts, fell in it, comprehending the best blood of France and Italy.* The viceroy Cardona went off somewhat too early for his reputation ; but the Spanish infantry under the Count Pedro Navarro behaved in a style worthy of the school of Gonsalvo. During the early part of the day they lay on the ground, in a position which sheltered them from the deadly artillery of Este, then the best mounted and best served of any in Europe. When at length, as the tide of battle was going against them, they were brought into the field, Navarro led them at once against a deep column of landsknechts, who, armed with the long German pike, were bearing down all before them. The Spaniards received the shock of this formidable weapon on the mailed panoply with which their bodies were covered, and, dexterously gliding into the hostile ranks, contrived with their short swords to do such execution on the enemy,

tom. v. lib. x. pp. 260—272.
—P. Jovius, Vita Leonis X.
lib. ii. pp. 37, 38.—Mém. du Chev. Bayard, chap. xlviii.—
Mém. de Fleurange, chap. xxvi
—xxviii.

* Ariosto introduces the bloody rout of Ravenna among the visions of Melissa ; in which the courtly prophetess (or rather poet) predicts the glories of the house of Este.

“ Nuoteranno i destrier fino alla pancia

Nel sangue uman per tutta
la campagna ;

Ch’ a seppellire il popol
verrà manco

Tedesco, Ispano, Greco, Italo e Franco.”

Orlando Furioso, Canto iii. st. 55.

unprotected except by corslets in front, and incapable of availing themselves of their long weapon, that they were thrown into confusion, and totally discomfited. It was repeating the experiment more than once made during these wars, but never on so great a scale, and it fully established the superiority of the Spanish arms.*

The Italian infantry, which had fallen back before the landsknechts, now rallied under cover of the Spanish charge; until at length the overwhelming clouds of French gendarmerie, headed by Ives d'Alègre, who lost his own life in the mêlée, compelled the allies to give ground. The retreat of the Spaniards, however, was conducted with admirable order, and they preserved their ranks unbroken, as they repeatedly turned to drive back the tide of pursuit. At this crisis, Gaston de Foix, flushed with success, was so exasperated by the sight of this valiant corps going off in so cool and orderly a manner from the field, that he made a desperate charge at the head of his chivalry, in hopes of breaking it. Unfortunately, his wounded horse fell under him. It was in vain his followers called out, "It is our viceroy,

* Brantôme, Vies des Hommes Illust. Disc. vi. — Guicciardini, tom. v. lib. x. pp. 290 — 305. — Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxi. ccxxxiii. — Mém. de Bayard, chap. liv. — Mém. de Bellay, tom. xvii. p. 234. — Mém. de Fleurange, chap. xxix. xxx. — Bembo, Istor. Viniz. tom. ii. lib. xii.

Machiavelli does justice to the gallantry of this valiant corps, whose conduct on this occasion furnishes him with a pertinent illustration, in estimating the comparative value of the Spanish, or rather Roman arms, and the German. Opere, tom. iv. Dell' Arte della Guerra, lib. ii. p. 67; ed. Genova, 1798.

the brother of your queen!" The words had no charm for a Spanish ear, and he was despatched with a multitude of wounds. He received fourteen or fifteen in the face; good proof, says the loyal serviteur, "that the gentle prince had never turned his back." *

There are few instances in history, if indeed there be any, of so brief, and at the same time so brilliant a military career, as that of Gaston de Foix; and it well entitled him to the epithet his countrymen gave him, of the "Thunderbolt of Italy."† He had not merely given extraordinary promise, but in the course of a very few months had achieved such results as might well make the greatest powers of the Peninsula tremble for their possessions. His precocious military talents, the early age at which he assumed the command of armies, as well as many peculiarities of his discipline and tactics, suggest some resemblance to the beginning of Napoleon's career.

Unhappily, his brilliant fame is sullied by a recklessness of human life, the more odious in one too

* Mém. du Chev. Bayard, chap. liv.—Guicciardini, tom. v. lib. x. pp. 306 — 309. — Pet. Martyr, ep. cccclxxxiii. — Brantôme, Hommes Illustres, disc. xxiv.

The best, that is, the most perspicuous and animated description of the fight of Ravenna, among contemporary writers, will be found in Guicciardini, (loc. cit.); among the modern, in Sismondi, (Rep. Ital. tom. xiv. chap. cix.) an author who has the rare merit of combining profound philosophical analysis with the superficial and picturesque graces of narrative.

† "Le foudre de l'Italie." (Gaillard, tom. iv. p. 391.) — light authority, I acknowledge, even for a sobriquet.

young to be steeled by familiarity with the iron trade to which he was devoted. It may be fair, however, to charge this on the age rather than on the individual, for surely never was there one characterized by greater brutality and more unsparing ferocity in its wars.* So little had the progress of civilization done for humanity. It is not until a recent period, that a more generous spirit has operated; that a fellow creature has been understood not to forfeit his rights as a man, because he is an enemy; that conventional laws have been established, tending greatly to mitigate the evils of a condition which, with every alleviation, is one of unspeakable misery; and that those who hold the destinies of nations in their hands have been made to feel, that there is less true glory, and far less profit, to be derived from war, than from the wise prevention of it.

The defeat at Ravenna struck a panic into the confederates. The stout heart of Julius II. falter-

* One example may suffice, occurring in the war of the League, in 1510. When Vicenza was taken by the Imperialists, a number of the inhabitants, amounting to one, or, according to some accounts, six thousand, took refuge in a neighbouring grotto, with their wives and children, comprehending many of the principal families of the place. A French officer, detecting their retreat, caused a heap of faggots to be piled up at the mouth of the cavern and set on fire. Out of the whole number of fugitives only one escaped with life; and the blackened and convulsed appearance of the bodies showed too plainly the cruel agonies of suffocation. (Mém. de Bayard, chap. xl.—P. Bembo, Istor. Viniz. tom. ii. lib. x.) Bayard executed two of the authors of this diabolical act on the spot. But the “chevalier sans reproche” was an exception to, rather than an example of, the prevalent spirit of the age.

ed, and it required all the assurances of the Spanish and Venetian ministers to keep him staunch to his purpose. King Ferdinand issued orders to the Great Captain to hold himself in readiness for taking the command of forces to be instantly raised for Naples. There could be no better proof of the royal consternation.*

The victory of Ravenna, however, was more fatal to the French than to their foes. The uninterrupted successes of a commander are so far unfortunate, that they incline his followers, by the brilliant illusion they throw around his name, to rely less on their own resources than on him whom they have hitherto found invincible; and thus subject their own destiny to all the casualties which attach to the fortunes of a single individual. The death of Gaston de Foix seemed to dissolve the only bond which held the French together. The officers became divided, the soldiers disheartened, and with the loss of their young hero lost all interest in the service. The allies, advised of this disorderly state of the army, recovered confidence and renewed their exertions. Through Ferdinand's influence over his son-in-law, Henry the Eighth of England, the latter had been induced openly to join the league in the beginning of the present year.* The Catholic king had the address, moreover, just before the battle, to detach the emperor from France, by effecting a truce between him and Venice.† The French, now menaced and pressed on every side, began their retreat under the brave La Palice; and to such an impotent state were they reduced, that in less than three months after the fatal victory, June 28th, they were at the foot of the Alps, having abandoned not only their recent, but all their conquests in the north of Italy.‡

* Guicciardini, tom. v. lib. x. pp. 310 — 312. 322, 323. — Cronica del Gran Cap. lib. iii. cap. vii. — Mariana, Hist. de Esp. tom. ii. lib. xxx. c. ix. —

P. Jovius, Vita Gonsalvi, lib. iii. p. 288.—Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1512. See also Lett. di Vettori, Maggio 16, 1514, ap. Opere di Machiavelli.

The same results now took place as in the late war against Venice. The confederates quarrelled over the division of the spoil. The republic, with the largest claims, obtained the least concessions. She felt that she was to be made to descend to an inferior rank in the scale of nations. Ferdinand earnestly remonstrated with the pope, and subsequently, by means of his Venetian minister, with Maximilian, on this mistaken policy.§ But the indifference of

* Dumont, Corps Diplomat. tom. iv. p. 137.

He had become a party to it as early as Nov. 17th, of the preceding year; he deferred its publication, however, until he had received the last instalment of a subsidy that Louis XII. was to pay him for the maintenance of peace. (Rymer, Fœdera, tom. xiii. pp. 311 — 323.—Sismondi, Hist. des Français, tom. xv. p. 385.) Even the chivalrous Harry the Eighth could not escape the trickish spirit of the age.

† Guicciardini, tom. v. lib. x. p. 320.

‡ Mém. du Chev. Bayard, chap. lv.—Mém. de Fleurange, chap. xxxi.—Ferrerias, tom. viii. pp. 380, 381.—Guicciardini, tom. v. lib. x. pp. 335, 336.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. xx.

§ Zurita, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. xlv.—xlvi.—Guicciardini, tom. vi. lib. xi. p. 52.

Martyr reports a conversation

the one, and the cupidity of the other, were closed against argument. The result was precisely what the prudent monarch foresaw. Venice was driven into the arms of her perfidious ancient ally, and on March 23rd, 1513, a definitive treaty was arranged with France for their mutual defence.* Thus the most efficient member was alienated from the confederacy. All the recent advantages of the allies were compromised. New combinations were to be formed, and new and interminable prospects of hostility opened.

Ferdinand, relieved from immediate apprehensions of the French, took comparatively little interest in Italian politics. He was too much occupied with settling his conquests in Navarre. The army, indeed, under Cardona, still kept the field in the north of Italy. The viceroy, after reëstablishing the Medici in Florence, remained inactive. The French, in the mean while, had again mustered in force, and crossing the mountains encountered the Swiss in a bloody battle at Novara, June 6th, 1513, where the former were entirely routed. Cardona, then rousing from his lethargy, traversed the Milanese without opposition, laying waste the ancient territories of Venice, burning the palaces and pleasure-houses of its lordly inhabitants on the beautiful banks of the Brenta, and approaching so near to the "Queen of that he had with the Venetian minister in Spain, touching this business. Opus Epist. ep. dxx.

* Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. part i. No. 86.

Adriatic," as to throw a few impotent balls into the the monastery of San Secondo.

The indignation of the Venetians and of Alviano, the same general who had fought so gallantly under Gonsalvo at the Garigliano, Oct. 7th, hurried them into an engagement with the allies near La Motta, at two miles' distance from Vicenza. Cardona, loaded with booty and entangled among the mountain passes, was assailed under every disadvantage. The German allies gave way before the impetuous charge of Alviano; but the Spanish infantry stood its ground unshaken, and by extraordinary discipline and valour succeeded in turning the fortunes of the day. More than 4000 of the enemy were left on the field; and a large number of prisoners, including many of rank, with all the baggage and artillery, fell into the hands of the victors.*

Thus ended the campaign of 1513; the French driven again beyond the mountains; Venice cooped up within her sea-girt fastnesses, and compelled to enrol her artisans and common labourers in her defence,

* Guicciardini, tom. vi. lib. xi. pp. 101 — 138. — Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. dxxiii. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxx. cap. xxi. — Mémoires de Fleurange, chap. xxxvi. xxxvii. — Also an original letter of King Ferdinand to Archbishop Deza, ap. Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxlii.

Alviano died a little more than a year after this defeat, at sixty years of age. He was so much beloved by the soldiery, that they refused to be separated from his remains, which were borne at the head of the army for some weeks after his death. They were finally laid in the church of St. Stephen in Venice; and the senate, with more gratitude than is usually conceded to republics, settled an honourable pension on his family.

is still strong in resources, above all, in the patriotic and unconquerable spirit of her people.*

Daru, Hist. de Venise, tom. i. 615, 616 ; 2nd edit.

Mons. Daru has supplied the vacuum so long standing, of authentic history of a state whose institutions were the admiration of earlier times, and whose long stability and success they deservedly an object of curiosity and interest to our

The style of the work, at once lively and condensed, is that best suited to historical writing, being of the piquant, dramatic kind much affected

French writers. The subject, too, of the revolutions of Venice, does not afford room for the dramatic interest attaching to events which admit of more extended biographical developement.

Abundant interest will be found, however, in the details with which he has disentangled the tortuous politics of the republic ; in the acute and always sensible reflections with which he clothes the dry skeleton of fact ; and in the novel stores of information he has opened. The foreign policy of Venice excited too much interest among friends and enemies in the day of her glory, not to occupy the pens of the most intelligent writers. But no Italian chronicler, not even one intrusted with the office by the government itself, has been able to exhibit the interior workings of the complicated machinery so satisfactorily as Mons. Daru has done, with the aid of those voluminous state papers, which were as jealously guarded from inspection, until the downfall of the republic, as the records of the Spanish inquisition.

CHAPTER XXIII.

CONQUEST OF NAVARRE.

1512, 1513.

WHILE the Spaniards were thus winning barren laurels on the fields of Italy, King Ferdinand was making a most important acquisition of territory nearer home. The reader has already been made acquainted with the manner in which the bloody sceptre of Navarre, in 1479, passed from the hands of Eleanor, Ferdinand's sister, after a reign of a few brief days, into those of her grandson Phœbus. A fatal destiny hung over the house of Foix ; and the latter prince lived to enjoy his crown only four years, when he was succeeded by his sister Catharine, in 1483.

It was not to be supposed that Ferdinand and Isabella, so attentive to enlarge their empire to the full extent of the geographical limits which nature seemed to have assigned it, would lose the opportunity now presented of incorporating into it the hitherto independent kingdom of Navarre, by the marriage of their own heir with its sovereign. All their efforts, however, were frustrated by the queen mother Magdaleine, sister of Louis XI, who, sacrificing the interests of the nation to her prejudices, evaded the proposed match under various pretexts, and in the end effected an union between her daughter and a French noble, Jean d'Albret, heir to considerable estates in the neighbourhood of Navarre. This was a most fatal error. The independence of Navarre had hitherto been maintained less through its own strength than the weakness of its neighbours; but now that the petty states around her had been absorbed into two great and powerful monarchies, it was not to be expected that so feeble a barrier would be longer respected, or that it would not be swept away in the first collision of those formidable forces. But, although the independence of the kingdom must be lost, the princes of Navarre might yet maintain their station by a union with the reigning family of France or Spain. By the present connexion with a mere private individual they lost both the one and the other.*

Still the most friendly relations subsisted between the Catholic king and his niece, during the lifetime of Isabella. The sovereigns assisted her in taking possession of her turbulent dominions, as well as in allaying the deadly feuds of the Beaumonts and Agramonts, with which they were rent asunder. They supported her with their arms in resisting her uncle Jean, Viscount of Narbonne, who claimed the crown on the groundless pretext of its being limited to male heirs.* The alliance with Spain was drawn still closer by the avowed purpose of Louis XII. to support his nephew, Gaston de Foix, in the claims of his deceased father.† The death of the young hero, however, at Ravenna, wholly changed the relations and feelings of the two countries. Navarre had nothing immediately to fear from France. She felt distrust of Spain on more than one account, especially for the protection afforded the Beaumontese exiles, at the head of whom was the young Count of Lerin, Ferdinand's nephew.‡

* See Part i. chapters x. xii.

France too, standing alone, and at bay, against the rest of Europe, found the alliance of the little state of Navarre of importance to her, especially at the present juncture, when the project of an expedition against Guienne, by the combined armies of Spain and England, naturally made Louis XII. desirous to secure the good-will of a prince who might be said to wear the keys of the Pyrenees, as the King of Sardinia did those of the Alps, at his girdle. With these amicable dispositions, the King and Queen of Navarre despatched their plenipotentiaries to Blois, early in May, 1512, soon after the battle

* Hist. de Navarre, par le Secrétaire de Henri IV. pp. 567. 570; ed. Paris, 1596.—Aleson, Anal. de Navarra, Contin. de Moret. tom. v. lib. xxxiv. cap. i; ed. Pamplona, 1766, fol. — Diccionario Geog. Histor. de España, tom. ii. p. 117.

† Aleson, tom. v. lib. xxxv. chap. xiii.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. ix. cap. liv. — Sismondi, Hist. des Français, tom. xv. p. 500.

‡ Aleson, ubi supra.

of Ravenna, with full powers to conclude a treaty of alliance and confederation with the French government.*

In the mean time, June 8th, an English squadron arrived at Passage in Guipuscoa, having 10,000 men on board under Thomas Grey, Marquis of Dorset,† in order to coöperate with King Ferdinand's army in the descent on Guienne. This latter force, consisting of 2500 horse, light and heavy, 6000 foot, and 20 pieces of artillery, was placed under Don Fadrique de Toledo, the old Duke of Alva, grandfather of the general who wrote his name in indelible characters of blood in the Netherlands, under Philip II.‡ Before making any movement, however, Ferdinand, who knew the equivocal dispositions of the Navarrese sovereigns, determined to secure himself from the annoyance which their strong position enabled them to give him on whatever route he

* Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. part i. p. 147.— See also the king's letter to Deza, Burgos, July 20th, 1512, ap. Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxv.

† Aleson, Anal. de Navarra, tom. v. p. 245. — Herbert, Life and Raigne of Henry VIII; ed. 1649, fol. p. 20.—Holinshed, Chronicles, p. 568; ed. 1810, 4to.—Mariana, tom. ix. p. 315.

His Valencian editors correct his text, by substituting Marquis of Dorchester!

‡ The young poet, Garcilasso de la Vega, gives a brilliant sketch of this stern old nobleman .

in his younger days, such as our imagination would scarcely have formed of him at any period.

“ Otro Marte 'n guerra, en corte Febo.

Mostravase mancebo en las señales

del rostro, qu'eran tales, qu'esperança

i cierta confiança claro davan

a cuantos le miravan; qu'el seria, en quien s' informaria un ser divino.”

Obras, ed. de Herrera, p. 505.

adopted. He accordingly, June 1512, sent to request a free passage through their dominions, with the demand, moreover, that they should intrust six of their principal fortresses to such Navarrese as he should name, as a guarantee for their neutrality during the expedition. He accompanied this modest proposal with the alternative, that the sovereigns should become parties to the Holy League, engaging in that case to restore certain places in his possession, which they claimed, and pledging the whole strength of the confederacy to protect them against any hostile attempts of France.*

The situation of these unfortunate princes was in the highest degree embarrassing. The neutrality they had so long and sedulously maintained was now to be abandoned: and their choice, whichever party they espoused, must compromise their possessions on one or the other side of the Pyrenees, in exchange for an ally whose friendship had proved by repeated experience quite as disastrous as his enmity. In this dilemma, they sent ambassadors into Castile to obtain some modification of the terms, or at least to protract negotiations till some definitive arrangement should be made with Louis XII. †

* Nebrissensis, Belli Navarriensis, lib. i. cap. iii.; ed. 1545. — Zurita, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. iv. v. — Aleson, tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. xv. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccclxxxviii. — Bernaldez, MS. ubi supra. — Garibay, Hist. de Navarra, tom. ii. lib.

xxix. cap. xxv. — Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 25.

† Zurita, Anal. de Aragon, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. vii. viii. — Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccclxxxvii. — Garibay, tom. iii. lib. xxix. cap. xxv.

On the 17th of July, their plenipotentiaries signed a treaty with that monarch at Blois, by which France and Navarre mutually agreed to defend each other, in case of attack, against all enemies whatever. By another provision, obviously directed against Spain, it was stipulated that neither nation should allow a passage to the enemies of the other through its dominions; and by a third, Navarre pledged herself to declare war on the English now assembled in Guipuscoa, and all those coöperating with them.*

Through a singular accident, Ferdinand was made acquainted with the principal articles of this treaty before its signature.† His army had remained inactive in its quarters around Victoria ever since the landing of the English. He now saw the hopelessness of further negotiation, and, determining to anticipate the stroke prepared for him, commanded his general to invade without delay, and occupy Navarre.

The Duke of Alva crossed the borders on the 21st of July, proclaiming that no harm should be offered to those who voluntarily submitted. On the 23rd,

* Dumont, Corps Diplom. tom. iv. P. i. No. 69.— Carta del Rey a D. Diego Deza, ap. Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxv.

† A confidential secretary of King Jean of Navarre was murdered in his sleep by his mistress. His papers, containing the heads of the proposed treaty with France, fell into the hands of a priest of Pampelona, who was induced by the hopes of a reward to betray them to Ferdinand. The story is told by Martyr, in a letter dated July 18th, 1512. (Epist. cccxc.) Its truth is attested by the conformity of the proposed terms with those of the actual treaty.

he arrived before Pampelona. King John, who, all the while he had been thus dallying with the lion, had made no provision for defence, had already abandoned his capital, leaving it to make the best terms it could for itself. On the following day, the city, having first obtained assurance of respect for all its franchises and immunities, surrendered; “a circumstance,” devoutly exclaims King Ferdinand, “in which we truly discern the hand of our blessed Lord, whose miraculous interposition has been visible through all this enterprise, undertaken for the weal of the church, and the extirpation of the accursed schism.”*

The royal exile, in the mean while, had retreated to Lumbier, where he solicited the assistance of the Duke of Longueville, then encamped on the northern frontier for the defence of Bayonne. The French commander, however, stood too much in awe of the English, still lying in Guipuscoa, to weaken himself by a detachment into Navarre; and the unfortunate monarch, unsupported either by his own subjects or

* Carta del Rey a D. Diego Deza, Burgos, July 26th, ap. Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxvi.—Hist. de Navarre par le Secrét. de Hen. IV. pp. 620—627.—Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xxi.—P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxcv. —Aleson, tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. xv.

Bernaldez has incorporated into his chronicle several letters of King Ferdinand, written during the progress of the war. It is singular that, coming from so high a source, they should not have been more freely resorted to by the Spanish writers. They are addressed to his confessor Deza, Archbishop of Seville, with whom Bernaldez, curate of a parish in his diocese, was, as appears from other parts of his work, on terms of intimacy.

his new ally, was compelled to cross the mountains, and take refuge with his family in France.*

The Duke of Alva lost no time in pressing his advantage; opening the way by a proclamation of the Catholic king, that it was intended only to hold possession of the country as security for the pacific disposition of its sovereigns, until the end of his present expedition against Guienne. From whatever cause, the Spanish general experienced so little resistance, that in less than a fortnight he overran and subdued nearly the whole of Upper Navarre. So short a time sufficed for the subversion of a monarchy which, in defiance of storm and stratagem, had maintained its independence unimpaired, with a few brief exceptions, for seven centuries.†

On reviewing these extraordinary events, we are led to distrust the capacity and courage of a prince who could so readily abandon his kingdom, without so much as firing a shot in its defence. John had shown, however, on more than one occasion, that he was destitute of neither. He was not, it must

* Aleson, Anal. de Navarra, tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. xv. — Hist. de Navarre, p. 622.—Nebrissensis, Belli Navar. lib. i. cap. iv. — “Jean d’Albret you were born,” said Catharine to her unfortunate husband, as they were flying from their kingdom, “and Jean d’Albret you will die. Had I been king, and you queen, we had been reigning in Navarre at this moment.” (Garibay, tom.

iii. lib. xxix. cap. xxvi.) Father Abarca treats the story as an old wife’s tale, and Garibay as an old woman for repeating it. Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xxi.

† Manifesto del Rey D. Fernando, July 30th, apud Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxvi.—Nebrissensis, Bell. Nav. lib. i. cap. v. — Garibay, tom. iii. lib. xxix. cap. xxvi.

be confessed, of the temper best suited to the fierce and stirring times on which he was cast. He was of an amiable disposition, social and fond of pleasure, and so little jealous of his royal dignity, that he mixed freely in the dances and other entertainments of the humblest of his subjects. His greatest defect was the facility with which he reposed the cares of state on favourites, not always the most deserving. His greatest merit was his love of letters.* Unfortunately, neither his merits nor defects were of a kind best adapted to extricate him from his present perilous situation, or enable him to cope with his wily and resolute adversary. For this, however, more commanding talents might well have failed. The period had arrived when, in the regular progress of events, Navarre must yield up her independence to the two great nations on her borders; who, attracted by the strength of her natural position, and her political weakness, would be sure, now that their own domestic discords were healed, to claim each the moiety which seemed naturally to fall within its own territorial limits. Particular events might accelerate or retard this result, but it was not in the power of human genius to avert its final consummation.

King Ferdinand, who descried the storm which was now gathering on the side of France, resolved to meet it promptly, and commanded his general to cross the mountains, and occupy the districts of Lower Navarre. In this he expected the coöperation of the English ; but he was disappointed. The Marquis of Dorset alleged, that the time consumed in the reduction of Navarre made it too late for the expedition against Guienne, which was now placed in a posture of defence. He loudly complained that his master had been duped by the Catholic king, who had used his ally to make conquests solely for himself ; and, in spite of every remonstrance, he re-embarked his whole force, without waiting for orders : “ a proceeding,” says Ferdinand in one of his letters, “ which touches me most deeply, from the stain it leaves on the honour of the most serene king my son-in-law, and the glory of the English nation, so distinguished in times past for high and chivalrous emprise.” *

* Aleson, Anales de Navarre, tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. ii. — Histoire du Royaume de Navarre, pp. 603, 604.

The Duke of Alva, thus unsupported, was no match for the French under Longueville, strengthened, moreover, by the veteran corps returned from Italy with the brave La Palice. Indeed, he narrowly escaped being hemmed in between the two armies, and only succeeded in anticipating by a few hours the movements of La Palice, so as to make good his retreat through the pass of Roncesvalles,

* See the king's third letter to Deza, Logroño, Nov. 12, ap. Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxvi.—Mariana, Hist. tom. ii. lib. xxx. cap. xii.—Nebrissensis, Belli and throw himself into Pampelona.* Hither he was speedily followed by the French general, accompanied by Jean d'Albret. On the 27th of November, the besiegers made a desperate though ineffectual assault on the city, which was repeated with equal ill fortune on the two following days. The beleaguering forces, in the mean time, were straitened for provisions; and at length, after a siege of some weeks, on learning the arrival of fresh reinforcements under the Duke of Najara,† they broke up their encampment, and withdrew across the mountains; and with them faded the last ray of hope for the restoration of the unfortunate monarch of Navarre.‡

Nav. lib. i. cap. vii.—P. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxcix.—Herbert's Henry VIII. p. 24.—Holinshed, Chronicles, p. 571.

* Garcilasso de la Vega alludes to these military exploits of the duke, in his second eclogue.

“Con mas ilustre nombre los arneses de los fieros Franceses abollava.”

Obras, ed. de Herrera, p. 505.

† Such was the power of the old Duke of Najara, that he brought into the field on this occasion 1100 horse and 3000 foot, raised and equipped on his own estates. P. Martyr, ep. dvii.

‡ Mém. du Chev. Bayard, ch. lv. lvi.—Mém. de Fleurange, chap. xxxiii.—Nebrissensis, Belli Nav. lib. i. cap. viii. ix. —Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xxi.—Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1512.

Jean and Catharine d'Albret passed the remainder of their days in their territories on the French side of the Pyrenees. They made one more faint and fruitless attempt to recover their dominions, during the regency of Cardinal Ximenes. (Carbajal, MS. cap. xii.) Broken in spirits, their health gradually declined, and neither of them long survived the loss of their crown. Jean died June 23rd, 1517, and Catharine followed, Feb. 12th of the next year;—happy, at least, that as misfortune had no power to divide them in life, so they were not long separated by death. (Hist. de Navarre, p. 643.—Aleson, tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. xx. xxi.) Their bodies sleep side by side in the cathedral church of Lescar, in their own dominions of Bearne; and their fate is justly

On the 1st of April in the following year, 1513, Ferdinand effected a truce with Louis XII, embracing their respective territories west of the Alps. It continued a year, and at its expiration was renewed for a similar time.* This arrangement, by which Louis sacrificed the interests of his ally the King of Navarre, gave Ferdinand ample time for consolidating and fortifying his new conquests; while it left the war open in a quarter where he well knew his enemies were more interested than himself to prosecute it with vigour. The treaty must be allowed to be more defensible on the score of policy than of good faith.† The allies loudly inveighed against the treachery of their confederate, who had so unscrupulously sacrificed the common interest by reacted by the Spanish historians as one of the most striking examples of that stern decree, by which the sins of the fathers are visited on the children to the third and fourth generation.

Flassan, Hist. de la Diplom. Fr. tom. i. p. 295. — Rymer, Fœdera, tom. xiii. pp. 350–352. — Guicciardini, tom. vi. xi. p. 82; lib. xii. p. 168. — Mariana, tom. ii. lib. xxx. cap. — “Fu cosa ridicola,” says Guicciardini in relation to this, “che nei medesimi giorni, la si bandiva solennemente tutta la Spagna, venne uno a significargli in nome del Re d’Inghilterra gli apparati magnificissimi, che ei faceva per aiutare la Francia, e a sollecitare che egli medesimamente facesse, secondo che aveva promesso, la guerra dalla parte di Spagna.” Istor. d’Italia, tom. vi. lib. xii. p. 84.

† Francesco Vettori, the Florentine ambassador at the papal court, writes to Machiavelli, that he lay awake two hours that night speculating on the real motives of the Catholic king in making this truce, which, regarded simply as a matter of policy, he condemns in toto. He accompanies this with various predictions respecting the consequences likely to result from it. These consequences never occurred, however; and the failure of his predictions may be received as the best refutation of his arguments. Opere di Machiavelli, Lett. Famigl. Aprile 21, 1513.

lieving France from the powerful diversion he was engaged to make on her western borders. It is no justification of wrong that similar wrongs have been committed by others ; but those who commit them (and there was not one of the allies who could escape the imputation, amid the political profligacy of the times,) certainly forfeit the privilege to complain.*

* Guicciardini, tom. vi. lib. xi. pp. 81, 82.—Opere di Machiavelli, ubi sup.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. dxxxviii.

On the 5th of April a treaty was concluded at Mechlin, in the names of Ferdinand, the King of England, the emperor, and the pope. (Rymer, Fœdera, tom. xiii. pp. 354—358.) The Castilian envoy, Don Luis Carroz, was not present at Mechlin ; but it was ratified and solemnly sworn to by him, on behalf of his sovereign, in London, April 18th. (Ibid. tom. xiii. p. 363.) By this treaty, Spain agreed to attack France in Guienne, while the other powers were to coöperate by a descent on other quarters. (See also Dumont, Corps Diplom. tom. iv. part i. No. 79.) This was in direct contradiction of the treaty signed only five days before at Orthes ; and, if made with the privity of King Ferdinand, must be allowed to be a gratuitous display of perfidy, not easily matched in that age. As such, of course, it is stigmatized by the French historians, that is, the later ones, for I find no comment on it in contemporary writers. (See Rapin, Hist. of England, vol. ii. pp. 93, 94 ; ed. 1785-9, fol. Eng. tr.—Sismondi, Hist. des Français, tom. xv. p. 626.) Ferdinand, when applied to by Henry VIII. to ratify the acts of his minister, in the following summer, refused, on the ground that the latter had transcended his powers. (Herbert, Life of Henry VIII; ed. 1649, p. 29.) The Spanish writers are silent. His assertion derives some probability from the tenor of one of the articles, which provides that in case he refuses to confirm the treaty, it shall still be binding between England and the emperor ; language which, as it anticipates, may seem to authorize such a contingency.

Public treaties have, for obvious reasons, been generally received as the surest basis for history. One might well doubt this, who attempts to reconcile the multifarious discrepancies and contradictions in those of the period under review. The science of diplomacy, as then practised, was a mere game of finesse and falsehood, in which, the more solemn the protestations of the parties, the more ground for distrusting their sincerity.

Ferdinand availed himself of the interval of repose, now secured, to settle his new conquests. He had transferred his residence first to Burgos, and afterwards to Logroño, that he might be near the theatre of operations. He was indefatigable in raising reinforcements and supplies, and expressed his intention at one time, notwithstanding the declining state of his health, to take the command in person. He showed his usual sagacity in various regulations for improving the police, healing the domestic feuds,—as fatal to Navarre as the arms of its enemies,—and confirming and extending its municipal privileges and immunities, so as to conciliate the affections of his new subjects.*

On the 23rd of March 1513, the estates of Navarre took the usual oaths of allegiance to King Ferdinand.† On June 15th, 1515, the Catholic monarch, by a solemn act in cortes, held at Burgos, incorporated his new conquests into the kingdom of Castile.‡ The event excited some surprise, considering his more intimate relations with Aragon. But it was to the arms of Castile that he was chiefly indebted for the conquest; and it was on her superior

* Carta del Rey a D. Diego Deza, Nov. 12, 1512, ap. Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxvi.—Aleson, tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. xvi.—Zurita, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. xiii. xxxvi. xliii.—Galindez de Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1512.

† Hist. de Navarre, par le Secrét. du Roi Hen. IV. pp. 629, 630.—Aleson, tom. v. lib xxxv.

cap. xvi.—Garibay, tom. iii. lib. xxx. cap. i.

‡ Zurita, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. xcii. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1515.—Garibay, tom. iii. lib. xxx. cap. i. — Aleson, tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. vii.—Sandoval, Hist. de Carlos V. tom. i. p. 26.

wealth and resources that he relied for maintaining it. With this was combined the politic consideration, that the Navarrese, naturally turbulent and factious, would be held more easily in subordination when associated with Castile, than with Aragon, where the spirit of independence was higher, and often manifested itself in such bold assertion of popular rights as falls most unwelcome on a royal ear. To all this must be added the despair of issue by his present marriage, which had much abated his personal interest in enlarging the extent of his patrimonial domains.

Foreign writers characterize the conquest of Navarre as a bold, unblushing usurpation, rendered more odious by the mask of religious hypocrisy. The national writers, on the other hand, have employed their pens industriously to vindicate it; some endeavouring to rake a good claim for Castile out of its ancient union with Navarre, almost as ancient, indeed, as the Moorish conquest. Others resort to considerations of expediency, relying on the mutual benefits of the connexion to both kingdoms; arguments which prove little else than the weakness of the cause.* All lay more or less stress on the

* The honest canon Salazar de Mendoza, (taking the hint from Nebrixa, indeed,) finds abundant warrant for Ferdinand's treatment of Navarre in the hard measure dealt by the Israelites of old to the people of Ephron, and to Sihon King of the Amorites. (Monarqu. de España, tom. i. lib. iii. cap. vi.)

It might seem strange, that a Christian should look for authority in the practices of the race he so much abominates, instead of the inspired precepts of the founder of his religion! But in truth your thorough-bred casuist is apt to be very little of a Christian.

celebrated bull of Julius II, of Feb. 18th, 1512, by which he excommunicated the sovereigns of Navarre, as heretics, schismatics, and enemies of the church, releasing their subjects from their allegiance, laying their dominions under an interdict, and delivering them over to any who should take, or had already taken, possession of them.* Most, indeed, are content to rest on this, as the true basis and original ground of the conquest. The total silence of the Catholic king respecting this document, before the invasion, and the omission of the national historians since to produce it, has caused much scepticism as to its existence; and although its recent publication puts this beyond doubt, the instrument contains, in my judgment, strong internal evidence for distrusting the accuracy of the date affixed to it, which should have been posterior to the invasion: a circumstance materially affecting the argument; and which makes the papal sentence not the original basis of the war, but only a sanction subsequently obtained to cover its injustice, and authorize retaining the fruits of it.†

* See the original bull of Julius II, ap. Mariana, tom. ix. Apend. No. 2; ed. Valencia, 1796.—“Joannem et Catharinam,” says the bull, in the usual conciliatory style of the Vatican, “perditionis filios,—excommunicatos, anathemizatos, maledictos, æterni supplicii reos,” &c. &c. “Our armies swore terribly in Flanders, cried my uncle Toby,—but nothing to this.—For my own part, I could not have a heart to curse my dog so.”

† The ninth volume of the splendid Valencian edition of Mariana contains in the Appendix the famous bull of Julius II. of Feb. 18th, 1512, the original of which is to be found in the royal archives of Barcelona. The editor, Don Francisco Ortiz y Sanz, has accompanied it with an elaborate disquisition, in which he makes the apostolic sentence the great authority for the conquest. It was a great triumph, undoubtedly, to be able to produce the document, to which the Spanish historians had been so long challenged in vain by foreign writers, and existence of which might well be doubted, since no record of it appears on the papal register. (Abarca, tom. ii. R. xxx. cap. xxi.) Paris de Grassis, maître des ceremonies of the chapel of Julius II. and Leo X, makes no mention of bull or excommunication, although very exact and particular in reporting such facts. (Bréquigny, Notices des MSS. du Roy, tom. ii. p. 570.) There is no reason that I know for doubting the genuineness of the present instrument. There are conclusive reasons to my mind, however, for rejecting its date, and assigning it to some time posterior to the conquest.

But whatever authority such a sanction may have had in the sixteenth century, it will find little respect in the present, at least beyond the limits of the Pyrenees. The only way in which the question can be fairly tried, must be by those maxims of public law universally recognised as settling the intercourse of civilized nations ; a science, indeed, imperfectly developed at that time, but in its general principles the same as now, founded, as these are, on the immutable basis of morality and justice.

1st. The bull denounces John and Catharine as having openly joined themselves to Louis XII. and borne arms with him against England, Spain, and the church ; a charge for which there was no pretence till five months later. —2nd. With this bull the editor has given another, dated Rome, July 21st, 1512, noticed by Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. ep. cccxcvii.) This latter is general in its import, being directed against all nations whatever engaged in alliance with France against the church. The sovereigns of Navarre are not even mentioned, nor the nation itself, any further than to warn it of the imminent danger in which it stood of falling into the schism. Now it is obvious that this second bull, so general in its import, would have been entirely superfluous in reference to Navarre, after the publication of the first ; while, on the other hand, nothing could be more na-

We must go back a step beyond the war, to the proximate cause of it. This was Ferdinand's demand of a free passage for his troops through Navarre. The demand was perfectly fair, and in ordinary cases would doubtless have been granted by a neutral nation ; but that nation must, after all, be the only judge of its propriety, and Navarre may find a justification for her refusal on these grounds. First, that, in her weak and defenceless state, it was attended with danger to herself ; secondly, that, as tural than that these general menaces and warnings, having proved ineffectual, should be followed by the particular sentence of excommunication contained in the bull of February. — 3rd. In fact, the bull of February makes repeated allusion to a former one, in such a manner as to leave no doubt that the bull of July 21st is intended ; since not only the sentiments, but the very form of expression, are perfectly coincident in both for whole sentences together. — 4th. Ferdinand makes no mention of the papal excommunication, either in his private correspondence, where he discusses the grounds of the war, or in his manifesto to the Navarrese, where it would have served his purpose quite as effectually as his arms. I say nothing of the negative evidence afforded by the silence of contemporary writers, as Nebrixa, Carbajal, Bernaldez, and Martyr, who, while they allude to a sentence of excommunication passed in the consistory, or to the publication of the bull of July, give no intimation of the existence of that of February ; a silence altogether inexplicable. The inference from all this is, that the date of the bull of February 18th, 1512, is erroneous ; that it should be placed at some period posterior to the conquest, and consequently could not have served as the ground of it, but was probably obtained at the instance of the Catholic king, in order, by the odium which it threw on the sovereigns of Navarre as excommunicate, to remove that under which he lay himself, and at the same time secure what might be deemed a sufficient warrant for retaining his acquisitions.

Readers in general may think more time has been spent on the discussion than it is worth ; but the important light in which it is viewed by those who entertain more deference for a papal decree, is sufficiently attested by the length and number of disquisitions on it, down to the present century.

by a previous and existing treaty with Spain, the validity of which was recognised in her new one of July 17th with France, she had agreed to refuse the right of passage to the latter nation, she consequently could not grant it to Spain without a violation of her neutrality ;* thirdly, that the demand of a passage, however just in itself, was coupled with another, the surrender of the fortresses, which must compromise the independence of the kingdom.†

But although, for these reasons, the sovereigns of Navarre were warranted in refusing Ferdinand's request, they were not therefore authorized to declare war against him, which they virtually did by entering into a defensive alliance with his enemy Louis XII, and by pledging themselves to make war on the English and their confederates ; an article pointedly directed at the Catholic king.

True, indeed, the treaty of Blois had not received the ratification of the Navarrese sovereigns : but it was executed by their plenipotentiaries duly authorized ; and, considering the intimate intercourse between the two nations, was undoubtedly made with their full knowledge and concurrence. Under these

* Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. part i. No. 69.

† According to Galindez de Carbajal, only three fortresses were originally demanded by Ferdinand. (Anales, MS. año 1512.) He may have confounded the number with that said to have been finally conceded by the King of Navarre ; a concession, however, which amounted to little, since it excluded by name two of the most important places required, and the sincerity of which may well be doubted, if, as it would seem, it was not made till after the negotiations with France had been adjusted. See Zurita, lib. x. cap. vii.

circumstances, it was scarcely to be expected that King Ferdinand, when an accident had put him in possession of the result of these negotiations, should wait for a formal declaration of hostilities, and thus deprive himself of the advantage of anticipating the blow of his enemy.

The right of making war would seem to include that of disposing of its fruits, subject, however, to those principles of natural equity which should regulate every action, whether of a public or private nature. No principle can be clearer, for example, than that the penalty should be proportioned to the offence. Now that inflicted on the sovereigns of Navarre, which went so far as to dispossess them of their crown, and annihilate the political existence of their kingdom, was such as nothing but extraordinary aggressions on the part of the conquered nation, or the self-preservation of the victors, could justify. As neither of these contingencies existed in the present case, Ferdinand's conduct must be regarded as a flagrant example of the abuse of the rights of conquest. We have been but too familiar, indeed, with similar acts of political injustice, and on a much larger scale, in the present civilized age; but, although the number and splendour of the precedents may blunt our sensibility to the atrocity of the act, they can never constitute a legitimate warrant for its perpetration.

While thus freely condemning Ferdinand's conduct in this transaction, I cannot go along with those who, having inspected the subject less minutely, are disposed to regard it as the result of a cool, premeditated policy from the outset. The propositions originally made by him to Navarre appear to have been conceived in perfect good faith. The requisition of the fortresses, impudent as it may seem, was nothing more than had been before made in Isabella's time, when it had been granted, and the security subsequently restored, as soon as the emergency had passed away.* The alternative proposed, of entering into the Holy League, presented many points of view so favourable to Navarre, that Ferdinand, ignorant as he then was of the precise footing on which she stood with France, might have seen no improbability in her closing with it. Had either alternative been embraced, there would have been no pretext for the invasion. Even when hostilities had been precipitated by the impolitic conduct of Navarre, Ferdinand (to judge not from his public manifestoes only, but from his private correspondence) would seem to have at first contemplated holding the country only till the close of his French expedition:† but the facility of retaining these conquests, when once acquired, was too strong a temptation. It was easy to find some plausible pretext to justify it, and obtain such a sanction from the highest authority as should veil the injustice of the

* Aleson, Anal. de Navar. tom. v. lib. xxxv. cap. i. iii. — Garibay, tom. iii. lib. xxix. cap. xiii.

† See King Ferdinand's letter, July 20th, and his manifesto, July 30th, 1512, ap. Bernaldez, MS. cap. ccxxxv. — Nebrissensis, Belli Nav. lib. i. cap. vii.

transaction from the world,—and from his own eyes. And that these were blinded is but too true, if, as an Aragonese historian declares, he could remark on his deathbed “that, independently of the conquest having been undertaken at the instance of the sovereign pontiff, for the extirpation of the schism, he felt his conscience as easy in keeping it, as in keeping his crown of Aragon.”*

* Abarca, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xxi.

I have made use of three authorities exclusively devoted to Navarre, in the present History. 1. “L’Histoire de Navarre, par un des Secrétaires Interpretes de sa Maiesté.” Paris, 1596. 8vo. This anonymous work, from the pen of one of Henry IV.’s secretaries, is little else than a meagre compilation of facts, and these deeply coloured by the national prejudices of the writer. It derives some value from this circumstance, however, in the contrast it affords to the Spanish version of the same transactions. 2. A tract entitled “De bello Navariensi libri duo; Ælii Antonii Nebrissensis.” It covers less than thirty pages folio, and is chiefly occupied, as the title imports, with the military events of the conquest by the Duke of Alva. It was originally incorporated in the volume containing its learned author’s version, or rather paraphrase of Pulgar’s Chronicle, with some other matters; and first appeared from the press of the younger Lebrija, “apud inclytam Granatam, 1545.” 3. But the great work illustrating the history of Navarre, is the “Anales del Reyno;” of which the best edition is that in seven volumes folio, from the press of Ibañez, Pamplona, 1766. Its typographical execution would be creditable to any country. The three first volumes were written by Moret, whose profound acquaintance with the antiquities of his nation has made his book indispensable to the student of this portion of its history. The fourth and fifth are the continuation of his work by Francisco de Aleson, a Jesuit, who succeeded Moret as historiographer of Navarre. The two last volumes are devoted to investigations illustrating the antiquities of Navarre, from the pen of Moret, and are usually published separately from his great historic work. Aleson's continuation, extending from 1350 to 1527, is a production of considerable merit. It shows extensive research on the part of its author, who, however, has not always confined himself to the most authentic and accredited sources of information. His references exhibit a singular medley of original contemporary documents, and apocryphal authorities of a very recent date. Though a Navarrese, he has written with the impartiality of one in whom local prejudices were extinguished in the more comprehensive national feelings of a Spaniard.

CHAPTER XXIV.

DEATH OF GONSALVO DE CORDOVA.—ILLNESS AND DEATH OF FERDINAND.—HIS CHARACTER.

1513—1516.

NOTWITHSTANDING the good order which King Ferdinand maintained in Castile by his energetic conduct, as well as by his policy of diverting the effervescing spirits of the nation to foreign enterprise, he still experienced annoyance from various causes. Among these were Maximilian's pretensions to the regency, as paternal grandfather of the heir apparent. The emperor, indeed, had more than once threatened to assert his preposterous claims to Castile in person ; and although this Quixotic monarch, who had been tilting against windmills all his life, failed to excite any powerful sensation, either by his threats or his promises, it furnished a plausible pretext for keeping alive a faction hostile to the interests of the Catholic king.

In the winter of 1509 an arrangement was made with the emperor, through the mediation of Louis the Twelfth, by which he finally relinquished his pretensions to the regency of Castile, in consideration of the aid of three hundred lances, and the transfer to him of the fifty thousand ducats which Ferdinand was to receive from Pisa.* No bribe was too paltry for a prince whose means were as narrow as his projects were vast and chimerical. Even after this pacification, the Austrian party contrived to disquiet the king, by maintaining the Archduke Charles's pretensions to the government in the name of his unfortunate mother; until, at length, the Spanish monarch came to entertain not merely distrust, but positive aversion for his grandson; while the latter, as he advanced in years, was taught to regard Ferdinand as one who excluded him from his rightful inheritance by a most flagrant act of usurpation.†

Ferdinand's suspicious temper found other grounds for uneasiness, where there was less warrant for it, in his jealousy of his illustrious subject Gonsalvo de Cordova. This was particularly the case when circumstances had disclosed the full extent of that general's popularity. After the defeat of Ravenna, the pope and the other allies of Ferdinand urged him in the most earnest manner to send the Great Captain into Italy, as the only man capable of checking the French arms, and restoring the fortunes of the league. The king, trembling for the immediate safety of his own dominions, gave a reluctant assent, and ordered Gonsalvo to hold himself in readiness to take command of an army to be instantly raised for Italy.*

* Mariana, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xxix. cap. xxi.—Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. viii. cap. xlv. xlvii.

† Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. lv. lxix.—Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dxxxix.

These tidings were received with enthusiasm by the Castilians. Men of every rank pressed forward to serve under a chief whose service was itself sufficient passport to fame. "It actually seemed," says Martyr, "as if Spain were to be drained of all her noble and generous blood. Nothing appeared impossible, or even difficult, under such a leader. Hardly a cavalier in the land but would have thought it a reproach to remain behind. Truly marvellous," he adds, "is the authority which he has acquired over all orders of men!" †

Such was the zeal with which men enlisted under his banner, that great difficulty was found in completing the necessary levies for Navarre, then menaced by the French. The king, alarmed at this, and relieved from apprehensions of immediate danger to Naples, by subsequent advices from that country, sent orders greatly reducing the number of forces to be raised. But this had little effect, since every man, who had the means, preferred acting as a volunteer under the Great Captain to any other service, however gainful; and many a poor cavalier was there who expended his little all, or cap. ii. — Giovio, Vita Magni Gonsalvi, lib. iii. p. 288.

* Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. cccclxxxvi.—Crónica del Gran Capitan, lib. iii. cap. vii. —Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x.

† Opus Epist. ep. cccclxxxvii.

incurred a heavy debt, in order to appear in the field in a style becoming the chivalry of Spain.

Ferdinand's former distrust of his general was now augmented tenfold by this evidence of his unbounded popularity. He saw in imagination much more danger to Naples from such a subject than from any enemy, however formidable: he had received intelligence, moreover, that the French were in full retreat towards the north. He hesitated no longer, but sent instructions to the Great Captain at Cordova, to disband his levies, as the expedition would be postponed till after the present winter; at the same time inviting such as chose to enlist in the service of Navarre.*

These tidings were received with indignant feelings by the whole army. The officers refused, nearly to a man, to engage in the proposed service. Gonsalvo, who understood the motives of this change in the royal purpose, was deeply sensible to what he regarded as a personal affront: he, however, enjoined on his troops implicit obedience to the king's commands. Before dismissing them, as he knew that many had been drawn into expensive preparations far beyond their means, he distributed largesses among them, amounting to the immense sum, if we may credit his biographers, of one hundred thousand ducats. "Never stint your hand," said he to his steward, who remonstrated on

* Giovio, Vita Magni Gonsalvi, lib. iii. p. 289.—Crónica del Gran Capitan, lib. iii. cap.

vii. viii.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 38.—Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. cccxcviii.

the magnitude of the donative ; “ there is no mode of enjoying one’s property, like giving it away.” He then wrote a letter to the king, in which he gave free vent to his indignation, bitterly complaining of the ungenerous requital of his services, and asking leave to retire to his duchy of Terranova in Naples, since he could be no longer useful in Spain. This request was not calculated to lull Ferdinand’s suspicions : he answered, however, “ in the soft and pleasant style which he knew so well how to assume,” says Zurita ; and, after specifying his motives for relinquishing, however reluctantly, the expedition, he recommended Gonsalvo’s return to Loja, at least until some more definite arrangement could be made respecting the affairs of Italy.

Thus condemned to his former seclusion, the Great Captain resumed his late habits of life, freely opening his mansion to persons of merit, interesting himself in plans for ameliorating the condition of his tenantry and neighbours, and in this quiet way winning a more unquestionable title to human gratitude than when piling up the blood-stained trophies of victory. Alas for humanity, that it should have deemed otherwise ! *

Another circumstance, which disquieted the Catholic king, was the failure of issue by his present

* Mariana, Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xxx. cap. xiv. — Giovio, Vitæ Illust. Virorum, pp. 290, 291.—Chrónica del Gran Capitan, lib. iii. cap. vii. viii. ix.—Zurita, Anales, tom.

vi. lib. x. cap. xxviii. — Quintana, Españoles Célebres, tom. i. pp. 328 — 332. — Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xx.

wife. The natural desire of offspring was further stimulated by hatred of the house of Austria, which made him eager to abridge the ample inheritance about to descend on his grandson Charles. It must be confessed, that it reflects little credit on his heart or his understanding, that he should have been so ready to sacrifice to personal resentment those noble plans for the consolidation of the monarchy, which had so worthily occupied the attention both of himself and of Isabella in his early life. His wishes had nearly been realized. Queen Germaine was delivered of a son, March 3rd, 1509. Providence, however, as if unwilling to defeat the glorious consummation of the union of the Spanish kingdoms, so long desired and nearly achieved, permitted the infant to live only a few hours.*

Ferdinand repined at the blessing denied him, now more than ever. In order to invigorate his constitution, he resorted to artificial means.† The medicines which he took had the opposite effect; at least from this time, the spring of 1531, he was afflicted with infirmities before unknown to him. Instead of his habitual equanimity and cheerfulness, he became impatient, irritable, and frequently a prey to morbid melancholy. He lost all relish for business, and even for amusements, except field

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1509.—Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. lv.

† They are detailed with such curious precision by Martyr,—who is much too precise, indeed, for our pages,—as to leave little doubt of the fact. Opus Epist. epist. dxxxix.

sports, to which he devoted the greater part of his time. The fever which consumed him made him impatient of long residence in any one place, and during these last years of his life the court was in perpetual migration. The unhappy monarch, alas! could not fly from disease, or from himself.*

In the summer of 1515, he was found one night by his attendants in a state of insensibility, from which it was difficult to rouse him. He exhibited flashes of his former energy after this, however. On one occasion he made a journey to Aragon, in order to preside at the deliberations of the cortes, and enforce the grant of supplies, to which the nobles, from selfish considerations, made resistance. The king failed, indeed, to bend their intractable tempers, but he displayed on the occasion all his wonted address and resolution.†

On his return to Castile, which, perhaps from the greater refinement and deference of the people, seems to have been always a more agreeable residence to him than his own kingdom of Aragon, he

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1513, et seq. — L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 188. — Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 146. — Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 27.

“Non idem est vultus,” says Peter Martyr of the king, in a letter dated in October, 1513, “non eadem facultas in audiendo, non eadem lenitas. Tria sunt illi, ne priores resumat vires, opposita: senilis ætas; secundum namque agit et sexagesimum annum: uxor, quam à latere nunquam abigit: et venatus cœlique vivendi cupiditas, quæ illum in sylvis detinet, ultra quàm in juvenili ætate, citra salutem, fas esset.” Opus Epist. epist. dxxix.

† Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. xciii. xciv. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1515. — Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dl.

received intelligence very vexatious, in the irritable state of his mind. He learned that the Great Captain was preparing to embark for Flanders, with his friend the Count of Ureña, the Marquis of Priego his nephew, and his future son-in-law, the Count of Cabra. Some surmised that Gonsalvo designed to take command of the papal army in Italy ; others, to join himself with the Archduke Charles, and introduce him, if possible, into Castile. Ferdinand, clinging to power more tenaciously as it was ready to slip of itself from his grasp, had little doubt that the latter was his purpose. He sent orders therefore to the south, to prevent the meditated embarkation, and, if necessary, to seize Gonsalvo's person. But the latter was soon to embark on a voyage where no earthly arm could arrest him.*

In the autumn of 1515 he was attacked by a quartan fever. Its approaches at first were mild. His constitution, naturally good, had been invigorated by the severe training of a military life ; and he had been so fortunate, that, notwithstanding the free exposure of his person to danger, he had never received a wound : but, although little alarm was occasioned at first by his illness, he found it impossible to throw it off ; and he removed to his residence in Granada, in hopes of deriving benefit from its salubrious climate. Every effort to rally the declining powers of nature proved unavailing; and, on the 2nd of December 1515, he expired in his own palace at Granada, in the arms of his wife and his beloved daughter Elvira.*

* Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. cap. xxiii.—Giovio, Vitæ Illust. Virorum, p. 292.
lib. x. cap. xcvi.—Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx.

The death of this illustrious man diffused universal sorrow throughout the nation. All envy and unworthy suspicion died with him. The king and the whole court went into mourning. Funeral services were performed in his honour, in the royal chapel and all the principal churches of the kingdom.† Ferdinand addressed a letter of consolation to his duchess, in which he lamented the death of one “who had rendered him inestimable services, and to whom he had ever borne such sincere affection!”‡ His obsequies were celebrated with great magnificence in the ancient Moorish capital, under the superintendence of the Count of Tendilla, the son and successor of Gonsalvo’s old friend, the late governor of Granada.§ His remains, first deposited in the Franciscan monastery, were after-

* Giovio, Vitæ Illust. Viro-rum, pp. 271. 292.—Crónica del Gran Capitan, lib. iii. cap.
ix.—Peter Martyr, *Opus Epist.
epist.* dlx. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1515.—Garibay, Com-pendio, tom. ii. lib. xx. cap.
xxiii.

† “Voilà la belle recompense,” says Brantôme drily, “que fist ce roy (Ferdinand) à ce grand capitaine, à qui il estoit tant obligé. Je croy encore que si ces grands honneurs mor-tuares et funerailles luy eussent beaucoup cousté, et qu’il les luy eust fallu faire à ses propres cousts et despens, comme à ceux du peuple, il n’y eust pas consommé cent escus, tant il estoit avare.” Œuvres, tom. i. p. 78.

‡ See a copy of the original letter in the Crónica del Gran Capitan, (fol. 164.) It is dated Jan. 3rd, 1516, only three weeks before Ferdinand’s death.

§ Peter Martyr notices the death of this estimable nobleman, full of years and of honours, in a letter dated July wards removed, and laid beneath a sumptuous mausoleum in the church of San Geronimo; and more than a hundred banners and royal pennons, waving in melancholy pomp around the walls of the chapel, proclaimed the glorious achievements of the warrior who slept beneath.* His noble wife, Doña Maria Manrique, survived him but a few days. His daughter Elvira inherited the princely titles and estates of her father, which, by her marriage with her kinsman, the Count of Cabra, were perpetuated in the house of Cordova.†

18th, 1515. It is addressed to Tendilla's son, and breathes the consolation flowing from the mild and philosophical spirit of its amiable author. The count was made Marquis of Mondejar by Ferdinand, a short time before his death. His various titles and dignities, including the government of Granada, descended to his eldest son, Don Luis, Martyr's early pupil; his genius was inherited in full measure by a younger, the famous Diego Hurtado de Mendoza.

* Navagiero, Viaggio, fol. 24.

On the top of the monument was seen the marble effigy of the Great Captain, armed and kneeling. The banners and other military trophies, which continued to garnish the walls of the chapel, according to Pedraza, as late as 1600, had disappeared before the eighteenth century; at least we may infer so from Colmenar's silence respecting them in his account of the sepulchre. Pedraza, Antigüedad de Granada, fol. 114.—Colmenar, Délices de l'Espagne, tom. iii. p. 505.

† Crónica del Gran Capitan, lib. iii. cap. ix. — Giovio, Vitæ Illust. Virorum, fol. 292.

Gonsalvo was created Duke of Terra Nuova and Sessa, and Marquis of Bitonto, all in Italy, with estates of the value of 40,000 ducats' rent. He was also Grand Constable of Naples, and a nobleman of Venice. His princely honours were transmitted by Doña Elvira to her son, Gonzalo Hernandez de Cordova, who filled the posts, under Charles V. of Governor of Milan, and Captain General of Italy. Under Philip II. his descendants were raised to a Spanish dukedom, with the title of Dukes of Baena. L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 24.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 41.—Salazar de Mendoza, Dignidades, p. 307.

Gonsalvo, or, as he is called in Castilian, Gonzalo le Hernandez de Cordova, was sixty-two years old at the time of his death. His countenance and person are represented to have been extremely handsome; his manners, elegant and attractive, were stamped with that lofty dignity which so often distinguishes his countrymen. "He still bears," says Martyr, speaking of him in the last years of his life, "the same majestic port as when in the height of his former authority; so that every one who visits him acknowledges the influence of his noble presence, as fully as when, at the head of armies, he gave laws to Italy." *

His splendid military successes, so gratifying to Castilian pride, have made the name of Gonsalvo as familiar to his countrymen as that of the Cid, which, floating down the stream of popular melody, has been treasured up as a part of the national history. His shining qualities, even more than his exploits, have been often made the theme of fiction; and fiction, as usual, has dealt with them in a fashion to leave only confused and erroneous conceptions of both. More is known of the Spanish hero, for instance, to foreign readers from Florian's agreeable novel, than from any authentic record of his actions; yet Florian, by dwelling only on the dazzling and popular traits of his hero, has depicted him as the very personification of romantic chivalry. This certainly was not his character, which might be said to have been formed after a riper period of civilization than the age of chivalry; at least, it had none of the nonsense of that age,—its fanciful vagaries, reckless adventure, and wild romantic gallantry.* His characteristics were prudence, coolness, steadiness of purpose, and intimate knowledge of man. He understood, above all, the temper of his own countrymen. He may be said in some degree to have formed their military character; their patience of severe training and hardship, their unflinching obedience, their inflexible spirit under reverses, and their decisive energy in the hour of action. It is certain, that the Spanish soldier under his hands assumed an entirely new aspect from that which he had displayed in the romantic wars of the Peninsula.

* Opus Epist. epist. cccxcviii. — Giovio, Vita Magni Gonsalvi, p. 292.

Gonsalvo was untainted with the coarser vices characteristic of the time. He discovered none of that griping avarice, too often the reproach of his countrymen in these wars. His hand and heart were liberal as the day. He betrayed none of the cruelty and licentiousness which disgrace the age of chivalry. On all occasions he was prompt to protect women from injury or insult. Although his distinguished manners and rank gave him obvious advantages with the sex, he never abused them;† and he has left a character, unimpeached

* Gonsalvo assumed for his device a cross-bow moved by a pulley, with the motto, “Ingenium superat vires.” It was characteristic of a mind trusting more to policy than force and daring exploit. Brantôme, Œuvres, tom. i. p. 75.

† Giovio, Vitæ Illust. Virorum, p. 271.

by any historian, of unblemished morality in his domestic relations. This was a rare virtue in the sixteenth century.

Gonsalvo's fame rests on his military prowess; yet his character would seem in many respects better suited to the calm and cultivated walks of civil life. His government of Naples exhibited much discretion and sound policy;* and there, as afterwards in his retirement, his polite and liberal manners secured not merely the good-will, but the strong attachment, of those around him. His early education, like that of most of the noble cavaliers who came forward before the improvements introduced under Isabella, was taken up with knightly exercises, more than intellectual accomplishments. He was never taught Latin, and had no pretensions to scholarship; but he honoured and nobly recompensed it in others. His solid sense and liberal taste supplied all deficiencies in himself, and led him to select friends and companions from among the most enlightened and virtuous of the community.†

On this fair character there remains one foul reproach. This is his breach of faith in two memor-

* Giovio, Vitæ Illust. Viro-um, p. 281.—Giannone, Istoria di Napoli, lib. xxx. cap. i. v.

† Giovio, Vitæ Illust. Viro-um, p. 271.

“Amigo de sus amigos, Que Señor para criados
Y parientes!
Qué enemigo de enemigos!

Qué maestro de esforzados
Y valientes!

Qué seso para discretos!
Qué gracia para donosos!
Qué razon!

Muy benigno á los sugetos,
Y á los bravos y dañosos
Un leon.”

Coplas de Don Jorge
Manrique.

able instances ; first, to the young Duke of Calabria, and afterwards to Cæsar Borgia, both of whom he betrayed into the hands of King Ferdinand, their personal enemy, and in violation of his most solemn pledges.* True, it was in obedience to his master's commands, and not to serve his own purposes ; and true also, this want of faith was the besetting sin of the age : but history has no warrant to tamper with right and wrong, or to brighten the character of its favourites by diminishing one shade of the abhorrence which attaches to their vices ; — they should rather be held up in their true deformity, as the more conspicuous from the very greatness with which they are associated. It may be remarked, however, that the reiterated and unsparing opprobrium with which foreign writers, who have been little sensible to Gonsalvo's merits, have visited these offences, affords tolerable evidence that they are the only ones of any magnitude that can be charged on him.†

* Borgia, after his father Alexander VI.'s death, escaped to Naples under favour of a safe-conduct signed by Gonsalvo. Here, however, his intriguing spirit soon engaged him in schemes for troubling the peace of Italy, and, indeed, for subverting the authority of the Spaniards there ; in consequence of which the Great Captain seized his person, and sent him prisoner to Castile. Such, at least, is the Spanish version of the story, and of course the one most favourable to Gonsalvo. Mariana dismisses it with coolly remarking, that “ the Great Captain seems to have consulted the public good in the affair, more than his own fame ; a conduct well worthy to be pondered and emulated by all princes and rulers ” ! Hist. de España, lib. xxviii. cap. viii. — Zurita, Anales, tom. v. lib. v. cap. lxxii. — Quintana, Esp. Célebres, pp. 302, 303.

† This may be thought to derive confirmation from the fact (if it be a fact) of Gonsalvo's

As to the imputation of disloyalty, we have elsewhere had occasion to notice its apparent groundlessness. It would be strange, indeed, if the ungenerous treatment, which he had experienced ever since his return from Naples, had not provoked feelings of indignation in his bosom; nor would it be surprising, under these circumstances, if he had been led to regard the Archduke Charles's pretensions to the regency, as he came of age, with a favourable eye. There is no evidence, however, of this, or of any act unfriendly to Ferdinand's interests. His whole public life, on the contrary, exhibited the truest loyalty; and the only stains that darken his fame were incurred by too unhesitating devotion to the wishes of his master. He is not the first nor the last statesman who has reaped the royal recompense of ingratitude, for serving his king with greater zeal than he had served his Maker.

Ferdinand's health, in the mean time, had declined so sensibly, that it was evident he could not long survive the object of his jealousy.* His dis-declaring, on his death-bed, that "there were three acts of his life which he deeply repented."

Two of these were his treatment of Borgia and the Duke of Calabria. He was silent respecting the third. "Some historians suppose," says Quintana, "that by this last he meant his omission to possess himself of the crown of Naples when it was in his power"! These historians, no doubt, like Fouché, considered a blunder in politics as worse than a crime.

* The miraculous bell of Vellilla, a little village in Aragon, nine leagues from Saragossa, about this time gave one of those prophetic tintinnabulations which always boded some great calamity to the country. The side on which the blows fell, denoted the quarter where ease had now settled into a dropsy, accompanied with a distressing affection of the heart. He found difficulty in breathing, complained that he was stifled in the crowded cities, and passed most of his time, even after the weather became cold, in the fields and forests, occupied, as far as his strength permitted, with the fatiguing pleasures of the chase. As the winter advanced, he bent his steps towards the south. He passed some time, in December, at a country-seat of the Duke of Alva, near Placentia, where he hunted the stag. He then resumed his journey to Andalusia, but fell so ill on the way, at the little village of Madrigalejo, near Truxillo, that it was found impossible to advance further.*

the disaster was to happen. Its sound, says Dr. Dormer, caused dismay and contrition, with dismal "fear of change," in the hearts of all who heard it. No arm was strong enough to stop it on these occasions, as those found to their cost who profanely attempted it. Its ill-omened voice was heard for the twentieth and last time, in March 1679. As no event of importance followed, it probably tolled for its own funeral.—See the edifying history, in Dr. Diego Dormer, of the miraculous powers and performances of this celebrated bell, as duly authenticated by a cloud of witnesses. Discursos Varios, pp. 198 — 244.

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. años 1513—1516.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 146. — Peter

Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dxxlii. dlviii. dlxi. dlxiv.—Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. xcix.

Carbajal states that the king had been warned, by some soothsayer, to beware of Madrigal, and that he had ever since avoided entering into the town of that name in Old Castile. The name of the place he was now in was not precisely that indicated, but corresponded near enough for a prediction. The event proved, that the witches of Spain, like those of Scotland,

" Could keep the word of promise to the ear,
And break it to the hope."

The story derives little confirmation from the character of Ferdinand. He was not superstitious, at least while his faculties were in vigour.

The king seemed desirous of closing his eyes to the danger of his situation as long as possible. He would not confess, nor even admit his confessor into his chamber.* He showed similar jealousy of his grandson's envoy, Adrian of Utrecht. This person, the preceptor of Charles, and afterwards raised through his means to the papacy, had come into Castile some weeks before, with the ostensible view of making some permanent arrangement with Ferdinand in regard to the regency. The real motive, as the powers which he brought with him subsequently proved, was, that he might be on the spot when the king died, and assume the reins of government. Ferdinand received the minister with cold civility, and an agreement was entered into, by which the regency was guaranteed to the monarch, not only during Joanna's life, but his own. Concessions to a dying man cost nothing. Adrian, who was at Guadalupe at this time, no sooner heard of Ferdinand's illness, than he hastened to Madrigalejo. The king, however, suspected the motives of his visit. "He has come to see me die," said he; and, refusing to admit him into his presence,

* "A la verdad," says Carbajal, "le tentó mucho el enemigo en aquel paso con incredulidad que le ponía de no morir tan presto, para que ni confesase ni recibiese los Sacramentos." According to the same writer, Ferdinand was buoyed up by the prediction of an old sibyl, "la beata del Barco," that "he should not die till he had conquered Jerusalem." (Anales, MS. cap. ii.) We are again reminded of Shakspeare,

"It hath been prophesied to me many years
I should not die but in Jerusalem."

King Henry IV.

ordered the mortified envoy back again to Guadalupe.*

At length the medical attendants ventured to inform the king of his real situation, conjuring him, if he had any affairs of moment to settle, to do it without delay. He listened to them with composure, and from that moment seemed to recover all his customary fortitude and equanimity. After receiving the sacrament, and attending to his spiritual concerns, he called his attendants around his bed, to advise with them respecting the disposition of the government. Among those present, at this time, were his faithful followers, the Duke of Alva, and the Marquis of Denia, his majordomo, with several bishops and members of his council.†

The king, it seems, had made several wills. By one, executed at Burgos in 1512, he had committed the government of Castile and Aragon to the Infante Ferdinand during his brother Charles's absence. This young prince had been educated in Spain under the eye of his grandfather, who entertained a strong affection for him. The counsellors remonstrated in the plainest terms against this disposition of the regency. Ferdinand, they said, was too young to take the helm into his own hands. His appointment would be sure to create new factions in Castile; it would raise him up to be in a manner a rival of his brother, and kindle ambitious desires in his bosom, which could not fail to end in his disappointment, and perhaps destruction.*

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. i. — Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, ubi supra. — Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dlixv. — Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 35.

† Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. ii.

Dr. Carbajal, who was a member of the royal council, was present with him during the whole of his last illness; and his circumstantial and spirited narrative of it forms an exception to the general character of his Itinerary.

The king, who would never have made such a devise in his better days, was more easily turned from his purpose now, than he would once have been. "To whom then," he asked, "shall I leave the regency?"—"To Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo," they replied. Ferdinand turned away his face, apparently in displeasure; but after a few moments' silence rejoined, "It is well; he is certainly a good man, with honest intentions. He has no importunate friends or family to provide for. He owes every thing to Queen Isabella and myself; and, as he has always been true to the interests of our family, I believe he will always remain so."†

He, however, could not so readily abandon the idea of some splendid establishment for his favourite grandson; and he proposed to settle on him the grand-masterships of the military orders: but to this his attendants again objected, on the same grounds as before; adding, that this powerful patronage was too great for any subject, and imploring him not to defeat the object which the late queen had so much at heart, of incorporating it with the crown. "Ferdinand will be left very poor then," exclaimed the king, with tears in his eyes. "He will have the good-will of his brother," replied one of his honest counsellors, "the best legacy your highness can leave him."*

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. ii.

† Ibid. ubi supra.

The testament, as finally arranged, settled the succession of Aragon and Naples on his daughter Joanna and her heirs. The administration of Castile during Charles's absence was intrusted to Ximenes, and that of Aragon to the king's natural son, the Archbishop of Saragossa, whose good sense and popular manners made him acceptable to the people. He granted several places in the kingdom of Naples to the Infante Ferdinand, with an annual stipend of fifty thousand ducats, chargeable on the public revenues. To his queen, Germaine, he left the yearly income of thirty thousand gold florins, stipulated by the marriage settlement, with five thousand a year more during widowhood.† The will contained, besides, several appropriations for pious and charitable purposes, but nothing worthy of particular note.‡ Notwithstanding the simplicity

* Carbajal, Anales, ubi supra.

† Ferdinand's gay widow did not long enjoy this latter pension. Soon after his death, she gave her hand to the Marquis of Brandenburg, and, he dying, she again married the Prince of Calabria, who had been detained in a sort of honourable captivity in Spain ever since the dethronement of his father, King Frede-ric. (Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 4, dial. 44.) It was the second sterile match, says Guicciardini, which Charles V, for obvious politic reasons, provided for the rightful heir of Naples. Istoria, tom. viii. lib. xv. p. 10.

‡ Ferdinand's testament is to be found in Carbajal, Anales, MS. — Dormer, Discursos Varios,

of the various provisions of the testament, it was so long, from the formalities and periphrases with which it was encumbered, that there was scarce time to transcribe it in season for the royal signature. On the evening of the 22nd of January 1516, he executed the instrument; and a few hours later, between one and two of the morning of the 23rd, Ferdinand breathed his last.* The scene of this event was a small house belonging to the friars of Guadalupe. "In so wretched a tenement," exclaims Martyr, in his usual moralizing vein, "did this lord of so many lands close his eyes upon the world."†

Ferdinand was nearly sixty-four years old, of which forty-one had elapsed since he first swayed the sceptre of Castile, and thirty-seven since he held that of Aragon. A long reign; long enough, indeed, to see most of those whom he had honoured and trusted of his subjects gathered to the dust, and a succession of contemporary monarchs come

p. 393, et seq.—Mariana, Hist. de España; ed. Valencia, tom. ix. Apend. No. 2.

* Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 9. —The queen was at Alcalá de Henares, when she received tidings of her husband's illness. She posted with all possible despatch to Madrigalejo; but, although she reached it on the 20th, she was not admitted, says Gomez, notwithstanding her tears, to a private interview with the king, till the testament was executed, a few hours only before his death. De Rebus Gestis, fol. 147.

† Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516.—L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 188.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 148.

"Tot regnorum dominus, totque palmarum cumulis ornatus, Christianæ religionis amplificator, et prostrator hostium, Rex in rusticanâ obiit casâ, et pauper contra hominum opinionem obiit." Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dlxvi. — Brantôme, (Vies des Hommes Illustres, p. 72,) and disappear like shadows.* He died deeply lamented by his native subjects, who entertained a partiality natural towards their own hereditary sovereign. The event was regarded with very different feelings by the Castilian nobles, who calculated their gains on the transfer of the reins from such old and steady hands into those of a young and inexperienced master. The commons, however, who had felt the good effect of this curb on the nobility, in their own personal security, held his memory in reverence as that of a national benefactor.†

Ferdinand's remains were interred, agreeably to his orders, in Granada. A few of his most faithful adherents accompanied them; the greater part being deterred by a prudent caution of giving umbrage to Charles.‡ The funeral train, however, was swelled by contributions from the various towns through which it passed. At Cordova, especially, it is worthy of note, that the Marquis of Priego, who had slender obligations to Ferdinand, who speaks of Madrigalejo as a "meschant village," which he had seen.

* Since Ferdinand ascended the throne, he had seen no less than four kings of England, as many of France, and also of Naples; three of Portugal, two German emperors, and half a dozen popes. As to his own subjects, scarcely one of all those familiar to the reader in the course of our history now survived, except, indeed, the Nestor of his time, the octogenarian Ximenes.

† Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. c.—Blancas, Commentarii, p. 275.—Lanuza, Historias, tom. i. lib. i. cap. xxv.

‡ Zurita, Anales, ubi supra.

The honest Martyr was one of the few who paid this last tribute of respect to their ancient master. "Ego ut mortuo debitum præstem," says he, in a letter to Prince Charles's physician, "corpus ejus exanime, Granatam, sepulchro sedem destinatam, comitabor." Opus Epist. epist. dlxvi.

came out with all his household to pay the last melancholy honours to his remains. They were received with similar respect in Granada, where the people, while they gazed on the sad spectacle, says Zurita, were naturally affected as they called to mind the pomp and splendour of his triumphal entry on the first occupation of the Moorish capital.*

By his dying injunctions, all unnecessary ostentation was interdicted at his funeral. His body was laid by the side of Isabella's in the monastery of the Alhambra; and the year following,† when the royal chapel of the metropolitan church was completed, they were both transported thither. A magnificent mausoleum of white marble was erected over them, by their grandson Charles the Fifth. It was executed in a style worthy of the age. The sides were adorned with figures of angels and saints, richly sculptured in bas-relief; on the top reposed the effigies of the illustrious pair, whose titles and merits were commemorated in the following brief, and not very felicitous inscription:

“MAHOMETICÆ SECTÆ PROSTRATORES, ET HÆRETICÆ PERVICACIÆ EXTINGTORES, FERNANDUS ARAGONUM, ET HELISABETA CASTELLÆ, VIR ET UXOR UNANIMES, CATHOLICI APPELLATI, MARMOREO CLAUDUNTUR HOC TUMULO.” ‡

* Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. c. — Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dlxxii. — Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xxiv. — Carbajal Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. v.

† Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. xxi.

According to Pedraza, this event did not take place till 1525. Antiguedad de Granada, lib. iii. cap. vii.

‡ Pedraza, Antiguedad de Granada, lib. iii. cap. vii. — “Assai bello per Spagna;” says Navagiero, who, as an

King Ferdinand's personal appearance has been elsewhere noticed. "He was of the middle size," says a contemporary, who knew him well: "his complexion was fresh; his eyes bright and animated; his nose and mouth small and finely formed, and his teeth white; his forehead lofty and serene; with flowing hair of a bright chestnut colour. His manners were courteous, and his countenance seldom clouded by any thing like spleen or melancholy. He was grave in speech and action, and had a marvellous dignity of presence. His whole demeanour, in fine, was truly that of a great king." For this flattering portrait Ferdinand must have sat at an earlier and happier period of his life.*

His education, owing to the troubled state of the times, had been neglected in his boyhood, though he was early instructed in all the generous pastimes and exercises of chivalry.† He was esteemed one

Italian, had a right to be fastidious. (Viaggio, fol. 23.) The artist, however, was not a Spaniard; at least, common tradition assigns the work to Philip of Burgundy, an eminent sculptor of the period, who has left many specimens of his excellence in Toledo and other parts of Spain. (Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. p. 577.) Laborde's magnificent work contains an engraving of the monuments of the Catholic sovereigns and Philip and Joanna; "qui rappellent la renaissance des arts en Italie, et sont, à la fois, d'une belle execution et d'une conception noble." Laborde, Voyage Pittoresque, tom. ii p. 25.

* L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 182.

Pulgar's portrait of the king, taken also in the morning of his life, the close of which the writer did not live to see, is equally bright and pleasing. "Habia," says he, "una gracia singular, que qualquier con él fablese, luego le amaba é le deseaba servir, porque tenia la comunicacion amigable." Reyes Católicos, p. 36.

† "He tilted lightly," says Pulgar, "and with a dexterity of the most perfect horsemen of his court. He led an active life, and the only kind of reading he appeared to relish was history. It was natural that so busy an actor on the great political theatre should have found peculiar interest and instruction in this study.*

He was naturally of an equable temper, and inclined to moderation in all things. The only amusement for which he cared much was hunting, especially falconry, and that he never carried to excess till his last years.† He was indefatigable in application to business. He had no relish for the pleasures of the table, and, like Isabella, was temperate even to abstemiousness in his diet.‡ He was frugal in his domestic and personal expenditure ; partly, no doubt, from a willingness to rebuke the opposite spirit of wastefulness and ostentation in his nobles. He lost no good opportunity of doing this. On one occasion, it is said, he turned to a gallant of the court noted for his extravagance in dress, and laying his hand on his own doublet ex-not surpassed by any man in the kingdom." Reyes Católicos, ubi supra.

* L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 153. — Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xxiv. — Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 37.

† Pulgar, indeed, notices his fondness for chess, tennis, and other games of skill, in early life. Reyes Católicos, part. ii. cap. iii.

‡ L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 182.—Pulgar, Reyes Católicos, part. ii. cap. iii.

"Stop and dine with us," he was known to say to his uncle, the Grand Admiral Henriquez, "we are to have a chicken for dinner to-day." (Sempere, Hist. del Luxo, tom. ii. p. 2, nota.) The royal cuisine would have afforded small scope for the talents of a Vatel or an Ude.

claimed, "Excellent stuff this; it has lasted me three pair of sleeves!"* This spirit of economy was carried so far as to bring on him the reproach of parsimony;† and parsimony, though not so pernicious on the whole as the opposite vice of prodigality, has always found far less favour with the multitude, from the appearance of disinterestedness which the latter carries with it. Prodigality in a king, however, who draws not on his own resources, but on the public, forfeits even this equivocal claim to applause. But, in truth, Ferdinand was rather frugal, than parsimonious. His income was moderate; his enterprises numerous and vast. It was impossible that he could meet them without husbanding his resources with the most careful economy.‡ No one has accused him of attempting to enrich his exchequer by the venal sale of office, like Louis the Twelfth; or by griping extortion, like another royal contemporary, Henry the Seventh. He amassed no treasure,§ and indeed

* Sempere, Hist. del Luxo, ubi supra.

† Machiavelli, by a single coup de pinceau, thus characterizes, or caricatures, the princes of his time. "Un imperatore instabile e vario; un re di Francia sdegnoso e pauroso; un re d'Inghilterra ricco, feroce, e cupido di gloria; un re di Spagna taccagno e avaro; per gli altri re, io no li conosco."

‡ The revenues of his own kingdom of Aragon were very limited. His principal foreign expeditions were undertaken solely on account of that crown; and this, notwithstanding the aid from Castile, may explain, and in some degree excuse, his very scanty remittances to his troops.

§ On one occasion, having obtained a liberal supply from the states of Aragon, (a rare occurrence,) his counsellors advised him to lock it up against a day of need. "Mas el Rey," says Zurita, "que siempre supo gastar su dinero provechosadied so poor, that he left scarcely enough in his coffers to defray the charges of his funeral.*

Ferdinand was devout ; at least he was scrupulous in regard to the exterior of religion. He was punctual in attendance on mass ; careful to observe all the ordinances and ceremonies of his church ; and left many tokens of his piety, after the fashion of the time, in sumptuous edifices and endowments for religious purposes. Although not a superstitious man for the age, he is certainly obnoxious to the reproach of bigotry ; for he coöperated with Isabella in all her exceptionable measures in Castile, and spared no effort to fasten the odious yoke of the Inmente, y nunca fue escasso en despendello en las cosas del estado, tuvo mas aparejo para emplearlo, que para encerrarlo." (Anales, tom. vi. fol. 225.) The historian, it must be allowed, lays quite as much emphasis on his liberality as it will bear.

* Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap.xxiv.—Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. c.—Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dlxvi.

"Vix ad funeris pompam et paucis familiaribus præbendas vestes pullatas, pecuniæ apud eum, neque alibi congestæ, repertæ sunt ; quod nemo unquam de vivente judicavit." (Pet. Martyr, ubi supra.) Guicciardini alludes to the same fact, as evidence of the injustice of the imputations on Ferdinand ; "Ma accade," adds the historian, truly enough, "quasi sempre per il giudizio corrotto degli uomini, che nei Re è più lodata la prodigalità, benchè a quella sia annessa la rapacità, che la parsimonia congiunta con l'astinenza dalla roba di altri." (Istoria, tom.vi. lib. xii. p. 273.)

The state of Ferdinand's coffers formed, indeed, a strong contrast to that of his brother monarch's, Henry VII. "whose treasure of store," to borrow the words of Bacon, "left at his death, under his own key and keeping, amounted unto the sum of eighteen hundred thousand pounds sterling ; a huge mass of money, even for these times." (Hist. of Henry VII. Works, vol. v. p. 183.) Sir Edward Coke swells this huge mass to "fifty and three hundred thousand pounds !" Institutes, part iv. chap. xxxv.

quisition on Aragon, and subsequently, though happily with less success, on Naples.*

Ferdinand has incurred the more serious charge of hypocrisy. His Catholic zeal was observed to be marvellously efficacious in furthering his temporal interests.† His most objectionable enterprises, even, were covered with a veil of religion. In this, however, he did not materially differ from the practice of the age. Some of the most scandalous wars of that period were ostensibly at the bidding of the church, or in defence of Christendom against the infidel. This ostentation of a religious motive was indeed very usual with the Spanish and Portuguese. The crusading spirit, nourished by their struggle with the Moors, and subsequently by their African

* Abarca, Reyes de Aragon, tom. ii. Rey xxx. cap. xxiv.—L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 182.—Zurita, Anales, lib. ix. cap. xxvi.

Ferdinand's conduct in regard to the Inquisition in Aragon displayed singular duplicity. In consequence of the remonstrance of cortes, in 1512, in which that high-spirited body set forth the various usurpations of the Holy Office, Ferdinand signed a compact, abridging its jurisdiction. He repented of these concessions, however, and in the following year obtained a dispensation from Rome from his engagements. This proceeding produced such an alarming excitement in the kingdom, that the monarch found it expedient to renounce the papal brief, and apply for another, confirming his former compact. (Llorente, Hist. de l'Inquisition, tom. i. pp. 371 et seq.) One may well doubt whether bigotry entered as largely, as less pardonable motives of state policy, into this miserable juggling.

† “Disoit-on,” says Brantôme, “que la reyne Isabelle de Castille estoit une fort devote et religieuse princesse, et que luy, quel grand zele qu’il y eust, n’estoit devotieux que par ypocrisie, couvrant ses actes et ambitions par ce saint zele de religion.” (Œuvres, tom. i. p. 70.) “Copri,” says Guicciardini, “quasi tutte le sue cupidità sotto colore di onesto zelo della religione e di santa intenzione al bene comune.” (Istoria, tom. vi. lib. xii. p. 274.) The penetrating eye of Machiavelli glances at the same trait. Il Principe, cap. xxi.

and American expeditions, gave such a religious tone habitually to their feelings as shed an illusion over their actions and enterprises, frequently disguising their true character, even from themselves.

It will not be so easy to acquit Ferdinand of the reproach of perfidy which foreign writers have so deeply branded on his name,* and which those of his own nation have sought rather to palliate than to deny.† It is but fair to him, however, even here, to take a glance at the age. He came forward when government was in a state of transition from the feudal forms to those which it has assumed in modern times; when the superior strength of the great vassals was circumvented by the superior policy of the reigning princes. It was the dawn of the triumph of intellect over the brute force which had hitherto controlled the movements of nations, as of individuals. The same policy which these monarchs had pursued in their own domestic relations, they introduced into those with foreign states, when, at the close of the fifteenth century, the barriers that had so long kept them asunder were broken down. Italy was the first field on which the great powers were brought into any thing like a general collision: it was the country, too, in which this crafty policy had been first studied, and reduced to a regular system. A single extract from the political manual of that age* may serve as a key to the whole science, as then understood. "A prudent prince," says Machiavelli, "will not, and ought not, to observe his engagements, when it would operate to his disadvantage, and the causes no longer exist which induced him to make them."† Sufficient evidence of the practical application of the maxim may be found in the manifold treaties of the period, so contradictory, or, what is to the same purpose for our present argument, so confirmatory of one another in their tenor, as clearly to show the impotence of all engagements. There were no less than four several treaties in the course of three years, solemnly stipulating the marriage of the Archduke Charles and Claude of France. Louis the Twelfth violated his engagements, and the marriage after all never took place.‡

* Guicciardini, Istoria, lib. xii. p. 273. — Du Bellay, Mémoires, apud Petitot, Collection des Mémoires, tom. xvii. p. 272. — Giovio, Hist. sui Temporis, lib. xi. p. 160; lib. xvi. p. 336. — Machiavelli, Opere, tom. ix. Lett. Diverse, No. vi; ed. Milano, 1805. — Herbert, Life of Henry VIII. p. 63. — Sismondi, Républiques Italiennes, tom. xvi. ch. cxii. — Voltaire sums up Ferdinand's character in the following pithy sentence: "On l'appelait en Espagne le sage, le prudent; en Italie le pieux; en France et à Londres le perfide." Essai sur les Mœurs, chap. cxiv.

† "Home era de verdad," says Pulgar, "como quiera que las necesidades grandes en que le pusieron las guerras, le facian algunas veces variar." (Reyes Católicos, part. ii. cap. iii.) Zurita exposes and condemns this blemish in his hero's character, with a candour which does him credit. "Fue muy notado, no solo de los estrangeros, pero de sus naturales, que no guardava la verdad, y fe que prometia; y que se anteponia siempre, y sobrepujava el respeto de su propria utilidad, a lo que era justo y honesto." Anales, tom. vi. fol. 406.

* Charles V, in particular, testified his respect for Machiavelli, by having the "Principe" translated for his own use.

† Machiavelli, Opere, tom. vi. Il Principe, cap. xviii; ed. Genova, 1798.

‡ Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. part. i. Nos. vii. xi. xxviii. xxix.—Seyssel, Hist. de Louys XII. pp. 228—230.—St. Gelais, Hist. de Louys XII. p. 184.

Such was the school in which Ferdinand was to make trial of his skill with his brother monarchs. He had an able instructor in his father, John the Second of Aragon, and the result showed that the lessons were not lost on him. "He was vigilant, wary, and subtile," writes a French contemporary, "and few histories make mention of his being outwitted in the whole course of his life." * He played the game with more adroitness than his opponents, and he won it. Success, as usual, brought on him the reproaches of the losers. This is particularly true of the French, whose master, Louis the Twelfth, was more directly pitted against him.† Yet Ferdinand does not appear to be a whit more obnoxious to the charge of unfairness than his opponent.‡ If he deserted his allies when

* Mémoires de Bayard, chap lxi. — "This prince," says Lord Herbert, who was not disposed to overrate the talents any more than the virtues of Ferdinand, "was thought the most active and politique of his time. No man knew better how to serve his turn on everybody, or to make their ends conduce to his." Life of Henry VIII. p. 63.

† According to them, the Catholic king took no great pains to conceal his treachery. "Quelqu'un disant un jour à Ferdinand, que Louis XII. l'accusoit de l'avoir trompé trois fois, Ferdinand parut mécontent qu'il lui ravît une partie de sa gloire; Il en a bien menti, l'ivrogne, dit-il, avec toute la grossièreté du temps, je l'ai trompé plus de dix." (Gaillard, Rivalité, tom. iv. p. 240.) The anecdote has been repeated by other modern writers, I know not on what authority. Ferdinand was too shrewd a politician to hazard his game by playing the braggart.

‡ Paolo Giovio strikes the balance of their respective merits in this particular, in the following terms. "Ex horum enim longè maximorum nostræ tempestatis regum ingeniis, et tum liquidò et multùm antea præclarè compertum est, nihil omnino sanctum et inviolabile, vel in ritè conceptis sancitisque fœderibus reperiri, quòd, in proferendis imperiis augendisque opi-

it suited his convenience, he at least did not deliberately plot their destruction, and betray them into the hands of their deadly enemy, as his rival did with Venice in the league of Cambray.* The partition of Naples, the most scandalous transaction of the period, he shared equally with Louis; and, if the latter has escaped the reproach of the usurpation of Navarre, it was because the premature death of his general deprived him of the pretext and means for achieving it. Yet Louis the Twelfth, the “father of his people,” has gone down to posterity with a high and honourable reputation.†

Ferdinand, unfortunately for his popularity, had nothing of the frank and cordial temper, the genial expansion of the soul, which begets love. He carried the same cautious and impenetrable frigidity into private life, that he showed in public. “No one,” says a writer of the time, “could read his thoughts by any change of his countenance.”‡ Calm and bus, apud eos nihil ad illustris famæ decus interesset, dolone et nusquam sine fallaciis, an fide integrâ verâque virtute niterentur.” Hist. sui Temporis, lib. xi. p. 160.

* An equally pertinent example occurs in the efficient support he gave Cæsar Borgia in his flagitious enterprises against some of the most faithful allies of France. See Sismondi, Républiques Italiennes, tom. xiii. chap. ci.

† Read the honied panegyrics of Seyssel, St. Gelais, Voltaire even, to say nothing of Gaillard, Varillas, e tutti quanti, undiluted by scarce a drop of censure. Rare, indeed, is it to find one so imbued with the spirit of philosophy, as to raise himself above the local or national prejudices which pass for patriotism with the vulgar. Sismondi is the only writer in the French language, that has come under my notice, who has weighed the deserts of Louis XII. in the historic balance with impartiality and candour; and Sismondi is not a Frenchman.

‡ Giovio, Hist. sui Temporis, lib. xvi. p. 335.

calculating, even in trifles, it was too obvious that every thing had exclusive reference to self. He seemed to estimate his friends only by the amount of services they could render him. He was not always mindful of these services ; witness his ungenerous treatment of Columbus, the Great Captain, Navarro, Ximenes, — the men who shed the brightest lustre, and the most substantial benefits, on his reign ; witness also his insensibility to the virtues and long attachment of Isabella, whose memory he could so soon dishonour by a union with one every way unworthy to be her successor.

Ferdinand's connexion with Isabella, while it reflected infinite glory on his reign, suggests a contrast most unfavourable to his character. Hers was all magnanimity, disinterestedness, and deep devotion to the interests of her people. His was the spirit of egotism. The circle of his views might be more or less expanded, but self was the steady, unchangeable centre. Her heart beat with the generous sympathies of friendship, and the purest constancy to the first, the only object of her love. We have seen the measure of his sensibilities in other relations. They were not more refined in this ; and he proved himself unworthy of the admirable woman with whom his destinies were united, by indulging in those vicious gallantries too generally sanctioned by the age.* Ferdinand, in fine, a shrewd and politic prince, “surpassing,” as a French writer, not his friend, has remarked, “all the statesmen of his time in the science of the cabinet,”* may be taken as the representative of the peculiar genius of the age. While Isabella, discarding all the petty artifices of state policy, and pursuing the noblest ends by the noblest means, stands far above her age.

* Ferdinand left four natural daughters. The former, Don Alonso de Aragon, was born of

In his illustrious consort, Ferdinand may be said to have lost his good genius.† From that time his fortunes were under a cloud. Not that victory sat less constantly on his banner; but at home he had lost

“All that should accompany old age,
As honour, love, obedience, troops of friends.”

the Viscountess of Eboli, a Catalan lady. He was made archbishop of Saragossa when only six years old. There was little of the religious profession, however, in his life. He took an active part in the political and military movements of the period, and seems to have been even less scrupulous in his gallantries than his father. His manners in private life were attractive, and his public conduct discreet. His father always regarded him with peculiar affection, and intrusted him with the regency of Aragon, as we have seen, at his death.

Ferdinand had three daughters, also, by three different ladies, one of them a noble Portuguese. The eldest child was named Doña Juana, and married the Grand Constable of Castile.

The others, each named Maria, embraced the religious profession in a convent in Madrigal. L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 188. — Salazar de Mendoza, Monarquia, tom. i. p. 410.

* “Enfin il surpassa tous les Princes de son siècle en la science du Cabinet, et c’est à lui qu’on doit attribuer le premier et le souverain usage de la politique moderne.” Varillas, Politique de Ferdinand, liv. iii. disc. x.

† Brantôme notices a sobriquet which his countrymen had given to Ferdinand. “Nos François appelloient ce roy Ferdinand Jehan Gipon, je ne sçay pour quelle dérision; mais il nous cousta bon, et nous fist bien du mal, et fust un grand roy et sage.” Which his ancient editor thus explains: “Gi-

His ill-advised marriage disgusted his Castilian subjects. He ruled over them, indeed, but more in severity than in love. The beauty of his young queen opened new sources of jealousy;* while the disparity of their ages, and her fondness for frivolous pleasure, as little qualified her to be his partner in prosperity as his solace in declining years.† His tenacity of power drew him into vulgar squabbles with those most nearly allied to him by blood, which settled into a mortal aversion. Finally, bodily in-pon de l'Italien giubone, c'est que nous appellons jupon et jupe; voulant par là taxer ce prince de s'être laissé gouverner par Isabelle, reine de Castille, sa femme, dont il endossoit la jupe, pour ainsi dire, pendant qu'elle portoit les chausses." (Vies des Hommes Illustres, disc. v.) There is more humour than truth in the etymology. The gipon was part of a man's attire, being, as Mr. Tyrwhitt defines it, "a short cassock," and was worn under the armour. Thus Chaucer, in the Prologue to his "Canterbury Tales," says of his knight's dress,

"Of fustian he wered a gipon Alle besmotred with his habergeon."

Again, in his "Knight's Tale,"

"Som wol ben armed in an
habergeon,
And in a brest-plate, and in a gipon."

* When Ferdinand visited Aragon, in 1515, during his troubles with the cortes, he imprisoned the vice-chancellor, Antonio Agustin; being moved to this, according to Carbajal, by his jealousy of that minister's attentions to his young queen. (Anales, MS. año 1515,) It is possible. Zurita, however, treats it as mere scandal, referring the imprisonment to political offences exclusively. Anales, tom. vi. fol. 393.—See also Dormer, Anales de la Corona de Aragon, (Zaragoza, 1697,) lib. i. cap. ix.

† "Era poco hermosa," says Sandoval, who grudges her even this quality, "algo coja, amiga mucho de holgarse, y andar en banquetes, huertos y jardines, y en fiestas. Introduxo esta Señora en Castilla comidas soberbias, siendo los Castellanos, y aun sus Reyes muy moderados en esto. Pasabansele pocos dias que no convidase, ó fuese convidada. La que mas gastaba en fiestas y banquetes con ella, era mas su amiga." Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 12.

firmity broke the energies of his mind, sour suspicions corroded his heart, and he had the misfortune to live long after he had lost all that could make life desirable.

Let us turn from this gloomy picture to the brighter season of the morning and meridian of his life, when he sat with Isabella on the united thrones of Castile and Aragon, strong in the love of his own subjects, and in the fear and respect of his enemies. We shall then find much in his character to admire; his impartial justice in the administration of the laws; his watchful solicitude to shield the weak from the oppression of the strong; his wise economy, which achieved great results without burdening his people with oppressive taxes; his sobriety and moderation; the decorum, and respect for religion, which he maintained among his subjects; the industry he promoted by wholesome laws and his own example; his consummate sagacity, which crowned all his enterprises with brilliant success, and made him the oracle of the princes of the age.

Machiavelli, indeed, the most deeply read of his time in human character, imputes Ferdinand's successes, in one of his letters, to "cunning and good luck, rather than to superior wisdom." * He was

* Opere, tom. ix. Lettere Diverse, No. vi.; ed. Milano, 1805.

His correspondent, Vettori, is still more severe in his analysis of Ferdinand's public conduct. (Let. di 16 Maggio, 1514.)

These statesmen were the friends of France, with whom Ferdinand was at war, and personal enemies of the Medici, whom that prince reëstablished in the government. As political antagonists therefore, every eed fortunate ; and the “ star of Austria,” which

 : as his declined, shone not with a brighter or idier lustre. But success through a long series ears sufficiently, of itself, attests good conduct.
 he winds and waves,” says Gibbon, truly enough,
 e always on the side of the most skilful mari-
 .” The Florentine statesman has recorded a r and more deliberate judgment in the treatise ch he intended as a mirror for the rulers of the
 e. “ Nothing,” says he, “ gains estimation for rince like great enterprises. Our own age has ished a splendid example of this in Ferdinand Aragon. We may call him a new king, since n a feeble one he has made himself the most rerned and glorious monarch of Christendom ; and, ve ponder well his manifold achievements, we it acknowledge all of them very great, and some y extraordinary.”*

Other eminent foreigners of the time join in this r strain of panegyric.† The Castilians, mindful of the Catholic king, they not likely to be altogether assed in their judgments of olicity.—These views, how-find favour with Lord ert, who had evidently though he does not refer his correspondence. Life of y VIII. p. 63.

Opere, tom. vi. Il Principe, xxi. ; ed. Genova, 1798.

Martyr, who had better rtunities than any other rner for estimating the character of Ferdinand, affords the most honourable testimony to his kingly qualities, in a letter written when the writer had no motive for flattery, after that monarch’s death, to Charles V.’s physician. (Opus Epist. epist. dlxvii.) Guicciardini, whose national prejudices did not lie in this scale, comprehends nearly as much in one brief sentence.

 “ Re di eccellentissimo consiglio, e virtù, e nel quale, se fosse stato costante nelle promesse, of the general security and prosperity they had enjoyed under his reign, seem willing to bury his frailties in his grave; * while his own hereditary subjects, exulting with patriotic pride in the glory to which he had raised their petty state, and touched with grateful recollections of his mild, paternal government, deplore his loss in strains of national sorrow,† as the last of the revered line who no potresti facilmente riprendere cosa alcuna." Istoria, tom. vi. lib. xii. p. 273.) See also Brantôme, (Œuvres, tom. iv. disc. v.)—Giovio, with scarcely more qualification, Hist. sui Temporis, lib. xvi. p. 336.—Navagiero, Viaggio, fol. 27.—et alios.

* "Principe el mas señalado," says the prince of the Castilian historians, in his pithy manner, "en valor y justicia y prudencia que en muchos siglos España tuvo. Tachas á nadie pueden faltar sea por la fragilidad propia, ò por la malicia y envidia agena que combaten principalmente los altos lugares. Espejo sin duda por sus grandes virtudes en que todos los Principes de España se deben mirar." (Mariana, Hist. de España, tom. ix. p. 375, cap. ult.) See also a similar tribute to his deserts, with greater amplification, in Garibay, Compendio, tom. ii. lib. xx. cap. xxiv.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 148.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 42.—Ferrerias, Hist. d'Espagne, tom. ix.

p. 426 et seq.—et plurimis auct. antiq. et recentibus.

† See the closing chapter of the great Aragonese annalist, who terminates his historic labours with the death of Ferdinand the Catholic. (Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. c.) I will cite only one extract from the profuse panegyrics of the national writers, which attests the veneration in which Ferdinand's memory was held in Aragon. It is from one whose pen is never prostituted to parasitical or party purposes, and whose judgment is usually as correct as the expression of it is candid. "Quo plangore ac lamentatione universa civitas complebatur. Neque solùm homines, sed ipsa tecta, et parietes urbis videbantur acerbum illius, qui omnibus charissimus erat, interitum lugere. Et meritò. Erat enim, ut scitis, exemplum prudentiæ ac fortitudinis: summæ in re domesticæ continentiæ: eximiæ in publicâ dignitatis: humanitatis prætereà, ac leporis admirabilis. * * * * * Neque eos solùm, sed to preside over the destinies of Aragon, as a free and independent kingdom.

certè tantâ amplectebatur volentiâ, ut interdum is Rex, sed uniuscujustrûm genitor ac parens
ir. Post ejus interitum nostra juvenus languet, plus dedita quàm decere perinde, ac debuisset, lis et gloriæ cupiditate
r. * * * * * Quid plura?
es fuit in usu bene reg-posita, quæ illius Regis in effugeret. * * * * *
in eximiâ corporis venus-tate præditus. Sed pluris facere deberent consiliorum ac virtutum suarum, quam posteris reliquit, effigiem: quibus deni-que factum videmus, ut ab eo usque ad hoc tempus, non so-lùm nobis, sed Hispaniæ cunctæ, diuturnitas pacis otium confirmarit. Hæc aliaque ejusmodi quotidie à nostris senibus de Catholici Regis memoriâ enarrantur: quæ à rei veritate nequaquam abhorrent." Blancas, Commentarii, p. 276.

CHAPTER XXV.

ADMINISTRATION, DEATH, AND CHARACTER OF CARDINAL XIMENES.

1516, 1517.

THE personal history of Ferdinand the Catholic terminates, of course, with the preceding chapter. In order to bring the history of his reign, however, to a suitable close, it is necessary to continue the narrative through the brief regency of Ximenes, to the period when the government was delivered into the hands of Ferdinand's grandson and successor, Charles the Fifth.

By the testament of the deceased monarch, as we have seen, Cardinal Ximenez de Cisneros was appointed sole regent of Castile. He met with opposition, however, from Adrian, the Dean of Louvain, who produced powers of similar purport from Prince Charles. Neither party could boast a sufficient warrant for exercising this important trust; the one claiming it by the appointment of an individual who, acting merely as regent himself, had certainly no right to name his successor; while the other had only the sanction of a prince who, at the time of giving it, had no jurisdiction whatever in Castile. The misunderstanding which ensued was finally settled by an agreement of the parties to share the authority in common, till further instructions should be received from Charles.*

It was not long before they arrived. They confirmed the cardinal's authority in the fullest manner, while they spoke of Adrian only as an ambassador. They intimated, however, the most entire confidence in the latter; and the two prelates continued as before to administer the government jointly. Ximenes sacrificed nothing by this arrangement; for the tame and quiet temper of Adrian was too much overawed by the bold genius of his partner, to raise any opposition to his measures.†

The first requisition of Prince Charles was one that taxed severely the power and popularity of the new regent. This was to have himself proclaimed king; a measure extremely distasteful to the Castilians, who regarded it not only as contrary to established usage, during the lifetime of his mother, but as an indignity to her. It was in vain that Ximenes and the council remonstrated on the impropriety and impolicy of the measure.‡ Charles, fortified

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. viii.—Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xviii.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 150.—Quintanilla, Archetypo, lib. iv. cap. v.—Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. dial. de Ximeni.

† Carbajal has given us Charles's epistle, which is subscribed "El Principe." He did not venture on the title of king in his correspondence with the Castilians, though he affected it abroad. Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. x.

‡ The letter of the council is dated March 14th, 1516. It is recorded by Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. x.

by his Flemish advisers, sturdily persisted in his purpose; the cardinal, consequently, called a meeting of the prelates and principal nobles in Madrid, to which he had transferred the seat of government, and whose central position and other local advantages made it, from this time forward, with little variation, the regular capital of the kingdom.* The Doctor Carbajal prepared a studied and plausible argument in support of the measure.† As it failed, however, to produce conviction in his audience, Ximenes, chafed by the opposition, and probably distrusting its real motives, peremptorily declared, that those who refused to acknowledge Charles as king, in the present state of things, would refuse to obey him when he was so. “I will have him proclaimed in Madrid to-morrow,” said he, “and I doubt not every other city in the kingdom will follow the example.” He was as good as his word; and the conduct of the capital was imitated, with little opposition, by all the other cities in Castile: not so in Aragon, whose people were too much attached to their institutions to consent to it, till Charles first made oath in person to respect the laws and liberties of the realm.‡

* It became permanently so in the following reign of Philip II. Semanario Erudito, tom. iii. p. 79.

† Carbajal penetrates into the remotest depths of Spanish history for an authority for Charles's claim. He can find none better, however, than the examples of Alphonso VIII. and Ferdinand III; the former of whom used force, and the latter obtained the crown by the voluntary cession of his mother. His argument, it is clear, rests much stronger on expediency than precedent. Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. xi.

‡ Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 151, et seq.—Carbajal, Ar-

The Castilian aristocracy, it may be believed, did not much relish the new yoke imposed on them by their priestly regent. On one occasion, it is said, they went in a body and demanded of Ximenes by what powers he held the government so absolutely. He referred them for answer to Ferdinand's testament and Charles's letter. As they objected to these, he led them to a window of the apartment, and showed them a park of artillery below, exclaiming, at the same time, "There are my credentials, then!" The story is characteristic; but, though often repeated, must be admitted to stand on slender authority.*

One of the regent's first acts was the famous ordinance, encouraging the burgesses, by liberal rewards, to enrol themselves into companies, and submit to regular military training at stated seasons. The nobles saw the operation of this measure too well not to use all their efforts to counteract it.

ales, MS. año 1516, cap. ix.—xi. —Lanuza, Historias, tom. i. lib. ii. cap. ii.—Dormer, Anales de Aragon, lib. i. cap. i. xiii.—Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dlxxii. dxc. dciii.—Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 53.

* Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xviii.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 158.—Lanuza, Historias, tom. i. lib. ii. cap. iv.

Alvaro Gomez finds no better authority than vulgar rumour for this story. According to Robles, the cardinal, after this bravado, twirled his cordelier's belt about his fingers, saying, "he wanted nothing better than that to tame the pride of the Castilian nobles with!" But Ximenes was neither a fool nor a madman, although his over-zealous biographers make him sometimes one, and sometimes the other. Voltaire, who never lets the opportunity slip of seizing a paradox in character or conduct, speaks of Ximenes as one "qui, toujours vêtu en cordelier, met son faste à fouler sous ses sandales le faste Espagnol." Essai sur les Mœurs, chap. cxxi.

In this they succeeded for a time, as the cardinal, with his usual boldness, had ventured on it without waiting for Charles's sanction, and in opposition to most of the council. The resolute spirit of the minister, however, eventually triumphed over all resistance, and a national corps was organized, competent, under proper guidance, to protect the liberties of the people, but which unfortunately was ultimately destined to be turned against them.*

Armed with this strong physical force, the cardinal now projected the boldest schemes of reform, especially in the finances, which had fallen into some disorder in the latter days of Ferdinand. He made a strict inquisition into the funds of the military orders, in which there had been much waste and misappropriation; he suppressed all superfluous offices in the state, retrenched excessive salaries, and cut short the pensions granted by Ferdinand and Isabella, which he contended should determine with their lives. Unfortunately, the state was not materially benefited by these economical arrangements, since the greater part of what was thus saved was drawn off to supply the waste and cupidity of the Flemish court, who dealt with Spain with all the merciless rapacity that could be shown to a conquered province.†

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. xiii. — Quintanilla, Archetypo, lib. iv. cap. v. — Sempere, Hist. des Cortès, chap. xxv. — Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 159. — Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS.

† Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 174, et seq. — Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xviii. — Carbajal,

The foreign administration of the regent displayed the same courage and vigour: arsenals were established in the southern maritime towns, and a numerous fleet was equipped in the Mediterranean, against the Barbary corsairs; a large force was sent into Navarre, which defeated an invading army of French, and the cardinal followed up the blow by demolishing the principal fortresses of the kingdom; a precautionary measure, to which, in all probability, Spain owes the permanent preservation of her conquest.*

The regent's eye penetrated to the farthest limits of the monarchy. He sent a commission to Hispaniola, to inquire into and ameliorate the condition of the natives: at the same time he earnestly opposed (though without success, being overruled in this by the Flemish counsellors,) the introduction of negro slaves into the colonies, which, he predicted, from the character of the race, must ultimately result in a servile war. It is needless to remark how well the event has verified the prediction.†

Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. iii.

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1516, cap. xi.—Aleson, Anales de Navarra, tom. v. p. 327. — Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. lxx. — Quintanilla, Archetypo, b. iv. cap. v.

† Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, lib. 164, 165.—Herrera, Indias occidentales, tom. i. p. 278. — Las Casas, Œuvres; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 239.

Robertson states the ground of Ximenes's objection to have been the iniquity of reducing one set of men to slavery, in order to liberate another. (History of America, vol. i. p. 285.) A very enlightened reason, for which, however, I find not the least warrant in Herrera, (the authority cited by the historian,) nor in Gomez, nor in any other writer.

It is with less satisfaction that we must contemplate his policy in regard to the Inquisition. As head of that tribunal, he enforced its authority and pretensions to the utmost: he extended a branch of it to Oran, and also to the Canaries, and the New World.* In 1512, the new Christians had offered Ferdinand a large sum of money to carry on the Navarrese war, if he would cause the trials before that tribunal to be conducted in the same manner as in other courts, where the accuser and the evidence were confronted openly with the defendant. To this reasonable petition Ximenes objected, on the wretched plea that, in that event, none would be found willing to undertake the odious business of informer. He backed his remonstrance with such a liberal donative from his own funds, as supplied the king's immediate exigency, and effectually closed his heart against the petitioners. The application was renewed in 1516 by the unfortunate Israelites, who offered a liberal supply in like manner to Charles, on similar terms; but the proposal to which his Flemish counsellors, who may be excused, at least, from the reproach of bigotry, would have inclined the young monarch, was finally rejected through the interposition of Ximenes."†

The high-handed measures of the minister, while

* Llorente, Hist. de l'Inquisition, tom. i. chap. x. art. v.

† Paramo, De Origine Inquisitionis, lib. ii. tit. ii. cap. v. —

Llorente, Hist. de l'Inquisition, tom. i. chap. xi. art. i.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 184, 185.

they disgusted the aristocracy, gave great umbrage to the Dean of Louvain, who saw himself reduced to a mere cipher in the administration. In consequence of his representations, a second, and afterwards a third minister was sent to Castile, with authority to divide the government with the cardinal: but all this was of little avail. On one occasion, the co-regents ventured to rebuke their haughty partner, and assert their own dignity, by subscribing their names first to the despatches, and then sending them to him for his signature; but Ximenes coolly ordered his secretary to tear the paper in pieces, and make out a new one, which he signed, and sent out without the participation of his brethren. And this course he continued during the remainder of his administration.*

The cardinal not only assumed the sole responsibility of the most important public acts, but, in the execution of them seldom condescended to calculate the obstacles or the odds arrayed against him. He was thus brought into collision, at the same time, with three of the most powerful grandes of

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. ii. —Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 189, 190. —Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xviii.—Pet. Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dlxxxi.—Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS.

“Ni properaveritis,” says Martyr in a letter to Marliano, Prince Charles’s physician, “ruent omnia. Nescit Hispania parere non regibus, aut non legitime regnaturis. Nauseam inducit magnanimis viris hujus fratris, licet potentis et rei publicæ amatoris, gubernatio. Est quippe grandis animo, et ipse, ad ædificandum literatosque viros fovendum natus magis quàm ad imperandum, bellicis colloquiis et apparatus gaudet.” Opus Epist. epist. dlxxiii.

Castile ; the Dukes of Alva and Infantado, and the Count of Ureña. Don Pedro Giron, the son of the latter, with several other young noblemen, had maltreated and resisted the royal officers while in the discharge of their duty : they then took refuge in the little town of Villafrata, which they fortified and prepared for a defence. The cardinal, without hesitation, mustered several thousand of the national militia, and, investing the place, set it on fire, and deliberately rased it to the ground. The refractory nobles, struck with consternation, submitted. Their friends interceded for them in the most humble manner ; and the cardinal, whose lofty spirit disdained to trample on a fallen foe, showed his usual clemency by soliciting their pardon from the king.*

But neither the talents nor authority of Ximenes, it was evident, could much longer maintain subordination among the people, exasperated by the shameless extortions of the Flemings, and the little interest shown for them by their new sovereign. The most considerable offices in church and state were put up to sale ; and the kingdom was drained of its funds by the large remittances continually made, on one pretext or another, to Flanders. All this brought odium, undeserved indeed, on the cardinal's government;† for there is abundant evidence, that both he and the council remonstrated in the boldest manner on these enormities ; while they endeavoured to inspire nobler sentiments in Charles's bosom, by recalling the wise and patriotic administration of his grandparents.* The people, in the mean while, outraged by these excesses, and despairing of redress from a higher quarter, loudly clamoured for a convocation of cortes, that they might take the matter into their own hands. The cardinal evaded this as long as possible. He was never a friend to popular assemblies, much less in the present inflamed state of public feeling, and in the absence of the sovereign. He was more anxious for his return than any other individual, probably, in the kingdom. Braved by the aristocracy at home, thwarted in every favourite measure by the Flemings abroad, with an injured, indignant people to retrenchment, which he admits was a very hard case. (De Rebus Gestis, fol. 177.) Martyr, however, was never an extravagant encomiast of the cardinal, and one may imagine much more creditable reasons than that assigned for his disgust with him now.

* Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 198—201. — Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dlxvii. dlxxxiv. dxc. — Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. iii. vi. — Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. — Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 73.

† In a letter to Marliano, Martyr speaks of the large sums

“ ab hoc gubernatore ad vos missæ, sub parandæ classis prætextu.” (Opus Epist. epist. dlxxvi.) In a subsequent epistle to his Castilian correspondents, he speaks in a more sarcastic tone. “ Bonus ille frater Ximenez Cardinalis gubernator thesauros ad Belgas transmittendos coacervavit. * * * * Glacialis Oceani accolæ ditabuntur, vestra exilabitur Castilla.” (Epist. dcvi.) From some cause or other, it is evident the cardinal's government was not at all to honest Martyr's taste. Gomez suggests, as the reason, that his salary was clipped off in the general

* See a letter in Carbajal, containing this honest tribute to the illustrious dead. (Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. iv.) Charles might have found an antidote to the poison of his Flemish sycophants in the faithful counsels of his Castilian ministers.

control, and oppressed, moreover, by infirmities and years, even his stern inflexible spirit could scarcely sustain him under a burden too grievous, in these circumstances, for any subject.*

At length the young monarch, having made all preliminary arrangements, prepared, though still in opposition to the wishes of his courtiers, to embark for his Spanish dominions. Previously to this, on the 13th of August 1516, the French and Spanish plenipotentiaries signed a treaty of peace at Noyon. The principal article stipulated the marriage of Charles to the daughter of Francis the First, who was to cede, as her dowry, the French claims on Naples. The marriage, indeed, never took place; but the treaty itself may be considered as finally adjusting the hostile relations which had subsisted, during so many years of Ferdinand's reign, with the rival monarchy of France, and as closing the long series of wars which had grown out of the league of Cambray.†

On the 17th of September 1517, Charles landed at Villaviciosa, in the Asturias. Ximenes at this

* Peter Martyr, Opus Epist. epist. dcii. — Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 194. — Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xviii.

Martyr, in a letter written just before the king's landing, notices the cardinal's low state of health and spirits. "Cardinalis gubernator Matriti febribus ægrotaverat; convaluerat; nunc recidivavit. * * * * *

Breves fore dies illius, Medici autumant. Est octogenario major; ipse regis adventum affectu avidissimo desiderare videtur. Sentit sine rege non rite posse corda Hispanorum moderari ac regi." Epist. dxcviii.

† Flassan, Diplomatie Française, tom. i. p. 313. — Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, tom. iv. part. i. No. 106.

time lay ill at the Franciscan monastery of Aguilera, near Aranda on the Douro. The good tidings of the royal landing operated like a cordial on his spirits, and he instantly despatched letters to the young monarch, filled with wholesome counsel as to the conduct he should pursue in order to conciliate the affections of the people. He received at the same time messages from the king, couched in the most gracious terms, and expressing the liveliest interest in his restoration to health.

The Flemings in Charles's suite, however, looked with great apprehension to his meeting with the cardinal. They had been content that the latter should rule the state, when his arm was needed to curb the Castilian aristocracy; but they dreaded the ascendancy of his powerful mind over their young sovereign, when brought into personal contact with him. They retarded this event, by keeping Charles in the north as long as possible. In the mean time, they endeavoured to alienate his regards from the minister by exaggerated reports of his arbitrary conduct and temper, rendered more morose by the peevishness of age. Charles showed a facility to be directed by those around him in early years, which gave little augury of the greatness to which he afterwards rose.*

By the persuasions of his evil counsellors, he addressed that memorable letter to Ximenes, which is unmatched, even in court annals, for cool and base ingratitude. He thanked the regent for all his past services, named a place for a personal interview with him, where he might obtain the benefit of his counsels for his own conduct and the government of the kingdom; after which he would be allowed to retire to his diocese, and seek from Heaven that reward which Heaven alone could adequately bestow ! *

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. ix.—Dormer, Anales de Aragon, lib. i. cap. i.—Ulloa, Vita di Carlo V. fol. 43.—Dolce, Vita di Carlo V. p. 12.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 212. — Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 83.

Such was the tenor of this cold-blooded epistle, which, in the language of more than one writer, killed the cardinal. This, however, is stating the matter too strongly. The spirit of Ximenes was of too stern a stuff to be so easily extinguished by the breath of royal displeasure.† He was, indeed, deeply moved by the desertion of the sovereign whom he had served so faithfully; and the excitement which it occasioned brought on a return of his fever, according to Carbajal, in full force. But anxiety and disease had already done their work upon his once hardy constitution; and this ungrateful act could only

* Carbajal, Anales, MS. ubi supra.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 215. — Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 84.

† “ Cette terrible lettre qui fut la cause de sa mort,” says Marsollier, plumply; a writer who is sure either to misstate or overstate. (Ministère du Card. Ximenez, p. 447.) Byron, alluding to the fate of a modern poet, ridicules the idea of “ The mind, that fiery particle,

Being extinguished by an Article ! ”

The frown of a critic, however, might as well prove fatal as that of a king. In both cases, I imagine, it would be hard to prove any closer connexion between the two events than that of time.

serve to wean him more effectually from a world that he was soon to part with.*

In order to be near the king, he had previously transferred his residence to Roa. He now turned his thoughts to his approaching end. Death may be supposed to have but little terrors for the statesman who in his last moments could aver "that he had never intentionally wronged any man; but had rendered to every one his due, without being swayed, as far as he was conscious, by fear or affection." Yet Cardinal Richelieu on his deathbed declared the same! †

As a last attempt, he began a letter to the king. His fingers refused, however, to perform their office, and after tracing a few lines he gave it up.

* "Con aquel despedimiento," says Galindez de Carbajal, "con esto acabó de tantos servicios luego que llegó esta carta el Cardenal rescibió alteracion y tomole recia calentura que en pocos dias le despacho." (Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. ix.) Gomez tells a long story of poison administered to the cardinal in a trout. (De Rebus Gestis, fol. 206.) Others say, in a letter from Flanders, (see Moreri, Dictionnaire Historique, voce Ximenes.) Oviedo notices a rumour of his having been poisoned by one of his secretaries; but vouches for the innocence of the individual accused, whom he personally knew. (Quincuagenas, MS. dial. de Xim.) Reports of this kind were too rife in these days to deserve credit, unless supported by very clear evidence. Martyr and Carbajal, both with the court at the time, intimate no suspicion of foul play.

† Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. ix.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 213, 214. —Quintanilla, Archetypo, lib. iv. cap. viii. —Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS.

" 'Voilà mon juge, qui prononcera bientôt ma sentence. Je le prie de tout mon cœur de me condamner, si, dans mon ministère, je me suis proposé autre chose que le bien de la religion et celui de l'état.' Le lendemain, au point du jour, il voulut recevoir l'extrême onction." Jay, Histoire du Ministère du Cardinal Richelieu, (Paris, 1816,) tom. ii. p. 217.

The purport of these seems to have been, to recommend his university at Alcalá to the royal protection. He now became wholly occupied with his devotions, and manifested such contrition for his errors, and such humble confidence in the divine mercy, as deeply affected all present. In this tranquil frame of mind, and in the perfect possession of his powers, he breathed his last, November 8th, 1517, in the eighty-first year of his age, and the twenty-second since his elevation to the primacy. The last words that he uttered were those of the Psalmist, which he used frequently to repeat in health, “In te, Domine, speravi,”—“In thee, Lord, have I trusted.”

His body, arrayed in his pontifical robes, was seated in a chair of state, and multitudes of all degrees thronged into the apartment to kiss the hands and feet. It was afterwards transported to Alcalá, and laid in the chapel of the noble college of San Ildefonso, erected by himself. His obsequies were celebrated with great pomp, contrary to his own orders, by all the religious and literary fraternities of the city; and his virtues commemorated in a funeral discourse by a doctor of the university, who, considering the death of the good a fitting occasion to lash the vices of the living, made the most caustic allusion to the Flemish favourites of Charles, and their pestilent influence on the country.*

* Robles, Vida de Ximenez, Gestis, fol. 215 — 217.—Quintanilla, Archetypo, lib. iv. cap. xviii. — Gomez, De Rebus

Such was the end of this remarkable man; the most remarkable, in many respects, of his time. His character was of that stern and lofty cast which seems to rise above the ordinary wants and weaknesses of humanity. His genius, of the severest order, like Dante's or Michael Angelo's in the regions of fancy, impresses us with ideas of power, that excite admiration akin to terror. His enterprises, as we have seen, were of the boldest character: his execution of them equally bold. He disdained to woo fortune by any of those soft and pliant arts which are often the most effectual. He pursued his ends by the most direct means. In this way he frequently multiplied difficulties; but difficulties seemed to have a charm for him, by the opportunity they afforded of displaying the energies of his soul.

With these qualities he combined a versatility of talent usually found only in softer and more flexible characters. Though bred in the cloister, he distinguished himself both in the cabinet and the camp; for the latter, indeed, so repugnant to his xii.—xv; who quotes Marañón, an eyewitness.—Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. ix; who dates the cardinal's death December 8th, in which he is followed by Lanuza.

The following epitaph, of no great merit, was inscribed on his sepulchre, composed by the learned John Vergara in his younger days.

“ *Condideram musis Franciscus grande lyceum, Condor in exiguo nunc ego sarcophago.
Prætextam junxi saccho, galeamque galero,
Frater, dux, præsul, cardineusque pater.
Quin virtute meâ junctum
est diadema cucullo, Cum mihi regnanti paruit Hesperia.*”

regular profession, he had a natural genius, according to the testimony of his biographer; and he evinced his relish for it by declaring, that "the smell of gunpowder was more grateful to him than the sweetest perfume of Arabia!"* In every situation, however, he exhibited the stamp of his peculiar calling; and the stern lineaments of the monk were never wholly concealed under the mask of the statesman, or the visor of the warrior. He had a full measure of the religious bigotry which belonged to the age; and he had melancholy scope for displaying it, as chief of that dread tribunal over which he presided during the last ten years of his life.†

He carried the arbitrary ideas of his profession into political life. His regency was conducted on the principles of a military despotism. It was his maxim, that "a prince must rely mainly on his army for securing the respect and obedience of his subjects."‡ It is true he had to deal with a mar-

* Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 160. — Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xvii. — "And who can doubt," exclaims Gonzalo de Oviedo, "that powder, against the infidel, is incense to the Lord?" Quincuagenas, MS.

† During this period, Ximenes "permit la condemnation," to use the mild language of Llorente of more than 2500 individuals to the stake, and nearly 50,000 to other punishments! (Hist. de l'Inquisition, tom. i.

chap. x. art. v.; tom. iv. chap. xlv.) In order to do justice to what is really good in the characters of this age, one must absolutely close his eyes against that odious fanaticism, which enters more or less into all, and into the best, unfortunately, most largely.

‡ "Persuasum haberet, non aliâ ratione animos humanos imperia aliorum laturos, nisi vi factâ aut adhibitâ. Quare pro certo affirmare solebat, nullum tial and factious nobility, and the end which he proposed was to curb their licentiousness, and enforce the equitable administration of justice ; but, in accomplishing this, he showed little regard to the constitution, or to private rights. His first act, the proclaiming of Charles king, was in open contempt of the usages and rights of the nation. He evaded the urgent demands of the Castilians for a convocation of cortes ; for it was his opinion, “ that freedom of speech, especially in regard to their own grievances, made the people insolent and irreverent to their rulers.”* The people, of course, had no voice in the measures which involved their most important interests : his whole policy,† indeed, was to exalt the royal prerogative at the expense of unquam principem exteris populis formidini, aut suis reverentiæ fuisse, nisi comparato militum exercitu, atque omnibus belli instrumentis ad manum paratis.” (Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 95.) We may well apply to the cardinal what Cato, or rather Lucan, applied to Pompey ;

“ Prætulit arma togæ ; sed pacem armatus amavit.”

Pharsalia, lib. ix.

* “ Nullâ enim re magis populos inolescere, et irreverentiam omnem exhibere, quàm cùm libertatem loquendi nacti sunt, et pro libidine suas vulgò jactant querimonias.” Gomez quotes the language of Xime-nes in his correspondence with Charles. De Rebus Gestis, fol. 194.

† Oviedo makes a reflection, showing that he conceived the cardinal’s policy better than most of his biographers. He states that the various immunities, and the military organization, which he gave to the towns, enabled them to raise the insurrection, known as the war of the “ comunidades,” at the beginning of Charles’s reign. But he rightly considers this as only an indirect consequence of his policy, which made use of the popular arm only to break down the power of the nobles, and establish the supremacy of the crown. Quincuagenas, MS.

the inferior orders of the state; and his regency, short as it was, and highly beneficial to the country in many respects, must be considered as opening the way to that career of despotism which the Austrian family followed up with such hard-hearted constancy.

But, while we condemn the politics, we cannot but respect the principles of the man. However erroneous his conduct in our eyes, he was guided by his sense of duty. It was this, and the conviction of it in the minds of others, which constituted the secret of his great power: it made him reckless of difficulties, and fearless of all personal consequences. The consciousness of the integrity of his purposes rendered him, indeed, too unscrupulous as to the means of attaining them. He held his own life cheap, in comparison with the great reforms that he had at heart. Was it surprising that he should hold as lightly the convenience and interests of others, when they thwarted their execution?

His views were raised far above considerations of self. As a statesman, he identified himself with the state; as a churchman, with the interests of his religion. He severely punished every offence against these: he as freely forgave every personal injury. He had many remarkable opportunities of showing this. His administration provoked numerous lampoons and libels. He despised them, as the miserable solace of spleen and discontent, and never persecuted their authors.* In this he formed an honourable contrast to Cardinal Richelieu, whose character and condition suggest many points of resemblance with his own.

His disinterestedness was further shown by his mode of dispensing his large revenues. It was among the poor, and on great public objects. He built up no family. He had brothers and nephews ; but he contented himself with making their condition comfortable, without diverting to their benefit the great trusts confided to him for the public.† The greater part of the funds which he left at his death was settled on the university of Alcalá.‡

He had, however, none of that pride which would make him ashamed of his poor and humble relatives. He had, indeed, a confidence in his own

* Quincuagenas, MS. ubi supra.

Mr. Burke notices this noble trait, in a splendid panegyric which he poured forth on the character of Ximenes, at Sir Joshua Reynolds's table, as related by Madame d'Arblay in the last, and not least remarkable, of her productions. (Memoirs of Dr. Burney, vol. ii. pp. 231 et seq.) The orator, if the lady reports him right, notices, as two of the cardinal's characteristics, his freedom from bigotry and despotism !

† Their connexion with so distinguished a person, however, enabled most of them to form high alliances ; of which Oviedo gives some account. Quincuagenas, MS.

‡ “ Die, and endow a college or a cat ! ”

The verse is somewhat stale, but expresses, better than a page of prose can, the questionable merit of such posthumous benefactions, when they spring, as is too often the case, from vanity, caprice, and selfishness. Such motives cannot be imputed to Ximenes. He had always conscientiously abstained from appropriating his archiepiscopal revenues, as we have seen, to himself or his family. His dying bequest, therefore, was only in keeping with his whole life.

powers approaching to arrogance, which led him to undervalue the abilities of others, and to look on them as his instruments rather than his equals ; but he had none of the vulgar pride founded on wealth or station. He frequently alluded to his lowly condition in early life with great humility, thanking Heaven, with tears in his eyes, for its extraordinary goodness to him. He not only remembered, but did many acts of kindness to his early friends, of which more than one touching anecdote is related. Such traits of sensibility, gleaming through the natural austerity and sternness of a disposition like his, like light breaking through a dark cloud, affect us the more sensibly by contrast.

He was irreproachable in his morals, and conformed literally to all the rigid exactions of his severe order, in the court as faithfully as in the cloister. He was sober, abstemious, chaste. In the latter particular he was careful that no suspicion of the license which so often soiled the clergy of the period, should attach to him.* On one occasion, while on a journey, he was invited to pass the night at the house of the Duchess of Maqueda, being informed that she was absent. The duchess was at home, however, and entered the man as a devil, let her be never so holy. Had it not been in the way of his professional calling, it is not too much to say he would never have suffered his eyes to light on one of them!" Archetypo, p. 80.

* The good father Quintanilla vindicates his hero's chastity, somewhat at the expense of his breeding. "His purity was unexampled," says he. "He shunned the sex, like so many evil spirits, looking on every wo-

apartment before he retired to rest. "You have deceived me, lady," said Ximenes, rising in anger; "if you have any business with me, you will find me to-morrow at the confessional." So saying, he abruptly left the palace.*

He carried his austerities and mortifications so far as to endanger his health. There is a curious brief extant of Pope Leo the Tenth, dated the last year of the cardinal's life, enjoining him to abate his severe penance, to eat meat and eggs on the ordinary fasts, to take off his Franciscan frock, and sleep in linen and on a bed. He would never consent, however, to divest himself of his monastic weeds. "Even laymen," said he, alluding to the custom of the Roman Catholics, "put these on when they are dying; and shall I, who have worn them all my life, take them off at that time!"†

Another anecdote is told in relation to his dress. Over his coarse woollen frock he wore the costly apparel suited to his rank. An impertinent Franciscan preacher took occasion one day before him to launch out against the luxuries of the time, especially in dress, obviously alluding to the cardinal, who was attired in a superb suit of ermine, which had been presented to him. He heard the sermon patiently to the end, and after the services

* Flechier, Histoire de Ximenes, liv. vi. p. 634.

† Quintanilla has given the brief of his Holiness in exten-

so, with commentaries thereon, twice as long. See Archetypo, lib. iv. cap. x.

were concluded, took the preacher into the sacristy, and, having commended the general tenor of his discourse, showed under his furs and fine linen the coarse frock of his order, next his skin. Some accounts add, that the friar, on the other hand, wore fine linen under his monkish frock. After the cardinal's death, a little box was found in his apartment, containing the implements with which he used to mend the rents of his threadbare garment, with his own hands.*

With so much to do, it may well be believed that Ximenes was avaricious of time. He seldom slept more than four, or at most four hours and a half. He was shaved in the night, hearing at the same time some edifying reading. He followed the same practice at his meals, or varied it with listening to the arguments of some of his theological brethren, generally on some subtle question of school divinity. This was his only recreation. He had as little taste as time for lighter and more elegant amusements. He spoke briefly, and always to the point. He was no friend of idle ceremonies and useless visits; though his situation exposed him more or less to both. He frequently had a volume lying open on the table before him, and when his

* Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 219. — Quintanilla, Archetypo, lib. ii. cap. iv.

The reader may find a pendant to this anecdote in a similar one recorded of Ximenes's predecessor, the Grand Cardinal Mendoza, in Part ii. chapter v. of this History. The conduct of the two primates on the occasion was sufficiently characteristic.

visiter stayed too long, or took up his time with light and frivolous conversation, he intimated his dissatisfaction by resuming his reading. The cardinal's book must have been as fatal to a reputation as Fontanelle's ear-trumpet.*

I will close this sketch of Ximenez de Cisneros with a brief outline of his person. His complexion was sallow ; his countenance sharp and emaciated ; his nose aquiline ; his upper lip projected far over the lower. His eyes were small, deep-set in his head, dark, vivid, and penetrating. His forehead ample, and, what was remarkable, without a wrinkle, though the expression of his features was somewhat severe.† His voice was clear, but not agreeable. His enunciation measured and precise. His demeanour was grave, his carriage firm and erect ; he was tall in stature, and his whole presence com-

* Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. —Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, ubi sup.—Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xiii. — Quintanilla, Arche-typo, lib. ii. cap. v. vii. viii ; who cites Dr. Vergara, the cardinal's friend.

It is Baron Grimm, I think, who tells us of Fontanelle's habit of dropping his trumpet when the conversation did not pay him for the trouble of holding it up. The good-natured Reynolds, according to Goldsmith, could "shift his trumpet" on such an emergency also.

† Ximenes's head was examined some forty years after his interment, and the skull was found to be without sutures. (Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 218.) Richelieu's was found to be perforated with little holes. The Abbé Richard deduces a theory from this which may startle the physiologist even more than the facts. "On ouvrit son Test, on y trouva 12 petits trous par où s'exhaloient les vapeurs de son cerveau, ce qui fit qu'il n'eût jamais aucun mal de tête ; au lieu que le Test de Ximenés étoit sans suture, à quoi l'on attribua les effroyables douleurs de tête qu'il avoit presque toujours." Parallèle, p. 177.

manding. His constitution, naturally robust, was impaired by his severe austerities and severer cares; and, in the latter years of his life, was so delicate as to be extremely sensible to the vicissitudes and inclemency of the weather.*

I have noticed the resemblance which Ximenes bore to the great French minister, Cardinal Richelieu: it was, after all, however, more in the circumstances of situation, than in their characters; though the most prominent traits of these were not dissimilar.† Both, though bred ecclesiastics, reached the highest honours of the state, and, indeed, may be said to have directed the destinies of their countries.‡ Richelieu's authority, however, was more absolute than that of Ximenes, for he was screened by the shadow of royalty; while the latter was exposed, by his insulated and unsheltered position, to the full blaze of envy, and, of course, opposition. Both were ambitious of military glory, and showed capacity for attaining it: both achieved their great results by that rare union of high mental endow-

* Robles, Vida de Ximenez, cap. xviii.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 218.

† A little treatise has been devoted to this very subject, entitled "Parallèle du Card. Ximenes et du Card. Richelieu, par Mons. l'Abbé Richard; à Trevoux, 1705," pp. 222; 12mo. The author, with a candour rare indeed where national vanity is interested, strikes the balance without hesitation in favour of the foreigner Ximenes.

‡ The catalogue of the various offices of Ximenes occupies near half a page of Quintanilla. At the time of his death, the chief ones that he filled were, those of Archbishop of Toledo, and consequently Primate of Spain, Grand Chancellor of Castile, Cardinal of the Roman Church, Inquisitor-general of Castile, and Regent.

ments and great efficiency in action, which is always irresistible.

The moral basis of their characters was entirely different. The French cardinal's was selfishness, pure and unmitigated: his religion, politics, his principles in short, in every sense, were subservient to this. Offences against the state he could forgive; those against himself he pursued with implacable rancour. His authority was literally cemented with blood. His immense powers and patronage were perverted to the aggrandizement of his family. Though bold to temerity in his plans, he betrayed more than once a want of true courage in their execution. Though violent and impetuous, he could stoop to be a dissembler; though arrogant in the extreme, he courted the soft incense of flattery. In his manners he had the advantage over the Spanish prelate. He could be a courtier in courts, and had a more refined and cultivated taste. In one respect he had the advantage over Ximenes in morals. He was not, like him, a bigot. He had not the religious basis in his composition which is the foundation of bigotry.—Their deaths were typical of their characters. Richelieu died, as he had lived, so deeply execrated, that the enraged populace would scarcely allow his remains to be laid quietly in the grave. Ximenes, on the contrary, was buried amid the tears and lamentations of the people; his memory was honoured even by his enemies, and his name is revered by his countrymen, to this day, as that of a Saint.

Dr. Lorenzo Galindez de Carbajal, one of the best authorities for transactions in the latter part of our History, was born of a respectable family, at Placencia, in 1472. Little is gathered of his early life, but that he was studious in his habits, devoting himself assiduously to the acquisition of the civil and canon law. He filled the chair of professor in this department, at Salamanca, for several years. His great attainments and respectable character recommended him to the notice of the Catholic queen, who gave him a place in the royal council. In this capacity he was constantly at the court, where he seems to have maintained himself in the esteem of his royal mistress, and of Ferdinand after her death. The queen testified her respect for Carbajal by appointing him one of the commissioners for preparing a digest of the Castilian law. He made considerable progress in this arduous work; but how great is uncertain, since, for whatever cause, (there appears to be a mystery about it,) the fruits of his labour were never made public; a circumstance deeply regretted by the Castilian jurists. (Asso y Manuel, Instituciones, Introd. p. 99.)

Carbajal left behind him several historical works, according to Nic. Antonio, whose catalogue, however, rests on very slender grounds. (Bibliotheca Nova, tom. ii. p. 3.) The work by which he is best known to Spanish scholars, is his “Anales del Rey Don Fernando el Católico,” which still remains in manuscript. There is certainly no Christian country for which the invention of printing, so liberally patronized there at its birth, has done so little as for Spain. Her libraries teem at this day with manuscripts of the greatest interest for the illustration of every stage of her history; but which, alas! in the present gloomy condition of affairs, have less chance of coming to the light than at the close of the fifteenth century, when the art of printing was in its infancy.

Carbajal's Annals cover the whole ground of our narrative, from the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella to the coming of Charles V. into Spain. They are plainly written, without ambition of rhetorical show or refinement. The early part is little better than memoranda of the principal events of the period, with particular notice of all the migrations of the court. In the concluding portion of the work, however, comprehending Ferdinand's death, and the regency of Ximenes, the author is very full and circumstantial. As he had a conspicuous place in the government, and was always with the court, his testimony in regard to this important period is of the highest value as that of an eyewitness and an actor, and it may be added, a man of sagacity and sound principles. No better commentary on the merit of his work need be required than the brief tribute of Alvaro Gomez, the accomplished biographer of Cardinal Ximenes. "Porro Annales Laurentii Galendi Caravajali, quibus vir gravissimus rerumque illarum cum primis particeps quinquaginta fermè annorum memoriam complexus est, haud vulgariter meam operam juverunt." De Rebus Gestis, Præfatio.

CHAPTER XXVI.

GENERAL REVIEW OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.

WE have now traversed that important period of history, comprehending the latter part of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century; a period when the convulsions, which shook to the ground the ancient political fabrics of Europe, roused the minds of its inhabitants from the lethargy in which they had been buried for ages. Spain, as we have seen, felt the general impulse. Under the glorious rule of Ferdinand and Isabella, we have beheld her emerging from chaos into a new existence; unfolding, under the influence of institutions adapted to her genius, energies of which she was before unconscious; enlarging her resources from all the springs of domestic industry and commercial enterprise; and insensibly losing the ferocious habits of a feudal age, in the refinements of an intellectual and moral culture.

In the fulness of time, when her divided powers had been concentrated under one head, and the system of internal economy completed, we have seen her descend into the arena with the other nations of Europe, and in a very few years achieve the most important acquisitions of territory, both in that quarter and in Africa ; and finally crowning the whole by the discovery and occupation of a boundless empire beyond the waters. In the progress of the action, we may have been too much occupied with its details to attend sufficiently to the principles which regulated them ; but, now that we have reached the close, we may be permitted to cast a parting glance over the field that we have traversed, and briefly survey the principal steps by which the Spanish sovereigns, under Divine Providence, led their nation up to such a height of prosperity and glory.

Ferdinand and Isabella, on their accession, saw at once that the chief source of the distractions of the country lay in the overgrown powers and factious spirit of the nobility ; their first efforts, therefore, were directed to abate these as far as possible. A similar movement was going forward in the other European monarchies ; but in none was it crowned with so speedy and complete success as in Castile, by means of those bold and decisive measures which have been detailed in an early chapter of this work.* The same policy was steadily pursued during the remainder of their reign ; less indeed by open assault than by indirect means.†

* Ante, Part I. chapter vi. for diminishing the consequence

† Among the minor means of the nobility, may be men-

Among these, one of the most effectual was the omission to summon the privileged orders to cortes, in several of the most important sessions of that body. This, so far from being a new stretch of prerogative, was only an exercise of the anomalous powers already familiar to the crown, as elsewhere noticed.* Nor does it seem to have been viewed as a grievance by the other party, who regarded these meetings with the more indifference, since their aristocratic immunities exempted them from the taxation which was generally the prominent object of them ; but, from whatever cause proceeding, by this impolitic acquiescence they surrendered, undoubtedly, the most valuable of their rights, — one which has enabled the British aristocracy to maintain its political consideration unimpaired, while that of the Castilian has faded away into an empty pageant.†

Another practice steadily pursued by the sovereigns, was to raise men of humble station to offices

tioned the regulation respecting the “privilegios rodados ;” instruments formerly requiring to be countersigned by the great lords and prelates, but which, from the time of Ferdinand and Isabella, were submitted for signature only to officers especially appointed for the purpose. Salazar de Mendoza, Dignidades, lib. ii. cap. xii.

* Ante, Introd. sect. i.

† A pertinent example of this policy of the sovereigns occurred in the cortes of Madrigal, 1476; where, notwithstanding the important subjects of legislation, none but the third estate were present. (Pulgar, Reyes Católicos, p. 94.) An equally apposite illustration is afforded by the care to summon the great vassals to the cortes of Toledo, in 1480, when matters nearly touching them, as the revocation of their honours and estates, were under discussion, but not till then. Ibid. p. 165.

of the highest trust ; not, however, like their contemporary, Louis the Eleventh, because their station was humble, in order to mortify the higher orders, but because they courted merit wherever it was to be found ;* — a policy much and deservedly commended by the sagacious observers of the time.† The history of Spain does not probably afford another example of a person of the lowly condition of Ximenes attaining, not merely the highest offices in the kingdom, but eventually its uncontrolled supremacy.‡ The multiplication of legal tribunals, and other civil offices, afforded the sovereigns ample scope for pursuing this policy, in the demand created for professional science. The nobles intrusted hitherto with the chief direction of affairs, now saw it pass into the hands of persons who had other qualifications than martial prowess or hereditary rank. Such as courted distinction were compelled to seek it by the regular avenues of academic discipline. How extensively the spirit operated and

* The same principle made them equally vigilant in maintaining the purity of those in office. Oviedo mentions, that in 1497 they removed a number of jurists, on the charge of bribery and other malversation, from their seats in the royal council. Quincuagenas, MS. dial. de Grizio.

† See a letter of the council to Charles V. commending the course adopted by his grandparents in their promotions to office, apud Carbajal, Anales, MS. año 1517, cap. iv.

‡ Yet instances of such advancement are not wanting in Spanish history ; witness the adventurer Ripperda, in Philip V.'s time, and the Prince of the Peace in our own ; men who, owing their success less to their own powers than the imbecility of others, could lay no claim to the bold and independent sway exercised by Ximenes.

with what brilliant success, we have already seen.* But, whatever the aristocracy may have gained in refinement of character, it resigned much of its prescriptive power, when it condescended to enter the arena on terms of equal competition with its inferiors for the prizes of talent and scholarship.

Ferdinand pursued a similar course in his own dominions of Aragon, where he uniformly supported the commons, or may more properly be said to have been supported by them, in the attempt to circumscribe the authority of the great feudatories. Although he accomplished this to a considerable extent, their power was too firmly intrenched behind positive institutions to be affected like that of the Castilian aristocracy, whose rights had been swelled beyond their legitimate limits by every species of usurpation.†

* Ante, Part I. chapter xix. —“No os parece á vos,” says Oviedo, in one of his Dialogues, “que es mejor ganado eso, que les dá su príncipe por sus servicios, é lo que llevan justamente de sus oficios, que lo que se adquiere robando capas ajenas, é matando é vertiendo sangre de Cristianos?” (Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 9.) The sentiment would have been too enlightened for a Spanish cavalier of the fifteenth century.

† In the cortes of Calatayud, in 1515, the Aragonese nobles withheld the supplies, with the design of compelling the crown to relinquish certain rights of jurisdiction, which it assumed over their vassals. “Les parecio,” said the Archbishop of Saragossa, in a speech on the occasion, “que auian perdido mucho, en que el ceptro real cobrasse lo suyo, por su industria.  Esto los otros estados del reyno lo atribuyeron à gran virtud: y lo estimauan por beneficio inmortal.” (Zurita, Anales, tom. vi. lib. x. cap. xciii.) The other estates, in fact, saw their interests too clearly, not to concur with the crown in this assertion of its ancient prerogative. Blancas, Modo de Proceder, fol. 100.

With all the privileges retrieved from this order, it still possessed a disproportionate weight in the political balance. The great lords still claimed some of the most considerable posts, both civil and military.* Their revenues were immense, and their broad lands covered unbroken leagues of extent in every quarter of the kingdom.† The queen, who

* Such, for example, were those of Great Chancellor, of Admiral, and of Constable of Castile. The first of these ancient offices was permanently united by Isabella with that of Archbishop of Toledo. The office of Admiral became hereditary, after Henry III, in the noble family of Enriquez, and that of Constable in the house of Velasco. Although of great authority and importance in their origin, and, indeed, in the time of the Catholic sovereigns, these posts gradually, after becoming hereditary, declined into mere titular dignities. Salazar de Mendoza, Dignidades, lib. ii. cap. viii. x; lib. iii. cap. xxi.—L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 24.

† The Duke of Infantado, head of the ancient house of Mendoza, whose estates lay in Castile, and, indeed, in most of the provinces of the kingdom, is described by Navagiero as living in great magnificence. He maintained a body-guard of 200 foot, besides men-at-arms; and could muster more than 30,000 vassals. (Viaggio, fol. 6. 33.) Oviedo makes the same statement. (Quincuagenas, MS. Bat.

1, quinc. 1, dial. 8.) Lucio Marinæo, among other things in his curious farrago, has given an estimate of the rents, “poco mas ó menos,” of the great nobility of Castile and Aragon, whose whole amount he computes at one-third of those of the whole kingdom. I will select a few of the names familiar to us in the present narrative.

Enriquez, Admiral of Castile, 50,000 ducats income, equal to 440,000 dollars.

Velasco, Constable of Castile, 60,000 ducats income; estates in Old Castile.

Toledo, Duke of Alva, 50,000 ducats income; estates in Castile and Navarre.

Mendoza, Duke of Infantado, 50,000 ducats income; estates in Castile and other provinces.

Guzman, Duke of Medina Sidonia, 55,000 ducats income; estates in Andalusia.

Cerda, Duke of Medina Celi, 30,000 ducats income; estates in Castile and Andalusia.

Ponce de Leon, Duke of Arcos, 25,000 ducats income; estates in Andalusia.

Pacheco, Duke of Escalona (Marquis of Villena), 60,000 reared many of their children in the royal palace under her own eye, endeavoured to draw her potent vassals to the court ;* but many, still cherishing the ancient spirit of independence, preferred to live in feudal grandeur, surrounded by their retainers in their strong castles, and wait there, in grim repose, the hour when they might sally forth and reassert by arms their despoiled authority. Such a season occurred on Isabella's death. The warlike nobles eagerly seized it ; but the wily and resolute Ferdinand, and afterwards the iron hand of Ximenes, kept them in check, and prepared the way for the despotism of Charles the Fifth, round whom the haughty aristocracy of Castile, shorn of substantial power, were content to revolve as the satellites of a court, reflecting only the borrowed splendours of royalty.

ducats income ; estates in Castile.

Cordova, Duke of Sessa, 60,000 ducats income ; estates in Naples and Andalusia.

Aguilar, Marquis of Priego, 40,000 ducats income ; estates in Andalusia and Estremadura.

Mendoza, Count of Tendilla, 15,000 ducats income ; estates in Castile.

Pinentel, Count of Benavente, 60,000 ducats income ; estates in Castile.

Giron, Count of Ureña, 20,000 ducats income ; estates in Andalusia.

Silva, Count of Cifuentes,

10,000 ducats income ; estates in Andalusia.

(Cosas Memorables, fol. 24, 25.) The estimate is confirmed, with some slight discrepancies, by Navagiero, Viaggio, fol. 18. 33, et alibi. See also Salazar de Mendoza, Dignidades, discurso ii.

* “ En casa de aquellos Príncipes estaban las hijas de los principales señores é cavalleros por damas de la Reyna é de las Infantas sus hijas, y en la corte andaban todos los mayorazgos y hijos de grandes é los mas heredados de sus reynos.” Oviedo, Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 4, dial. 44.

The queen's government was equally vigilant in resisting ecclesiastical encroachment. It may appear otherwise to one who casts a superficial glance at her reign, and beholds her surrounded always by a troop of ghostly advisers, and avowing religion as the great end of her principal operations at home and abroad.* It is certain, however, that, while in all her acts she confessed the influence of religion, she took more effectual means than any of her predecessors to circumscribe the temporal powers of the clergy.† The volume of her pragmáticas is filled with laws designed to limit their jurisdiction, and restrain their encroachments on the secular authorities.‡ Towards the Roman See she main-

* “ Como quier que oia el parecer de personas religiosas é de los otros letrados que cerca della eran, pero la mayor parte seguia las cosas por su arbitrio.” Pulgar, Reyes Católicos, part. i. cap. iv.

† Lucio Marinæo has collected many particulars respecting the great wealth of the Spanish clergy in his time. There were four metropolitan sees in Castile.

Toledo,	income	80,000	ducats.
St. James,	“	24,000	“
Seville,	“	20,000	“
Granada,	“	10,000	“

There were twenty-nine bishoprics, whose aggregate revenues, very unequally apportioned, amounted to 251,000 ducats. The church livings in Aragon were much fewer and leaner than in Castile. (Cosas Me-morables, fol. 23.) The Venetian Navagiero speaks of the metropolitan church of Toledo as “the wealthiest in Christendom;” its canons lived in stately palaces, and its revenues, with those of the archbishopric, equalled those of the whole city of Toledo. (Viaggio, fol. 9.) He notices also the great opulence of the churches of Seville, Guadalupe, &c. fol. 11. 13.

‡ See Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 11. 140, 141. 171, et loc. al.—From one of these ordinances, it appears the clergy were not backward in remonstrating against what they deemed an infringement of their rights. (Fol. 172.) The queen, however, while she guarded against their usurpations, interfered more than once, with her usual sense of justice, on tained, as we have often had occasion to notice, the same independent attitude. By the celebrated concordat made with Sixtus the Fourth, in 1482, the pope conceded to the sovereigns the right of nominating to the higher dignities of the church.* The Holy See, however, still assumed the collation to inferior benefices, which were too often lavished on non-residents, and otherwise unsuitable persons. The queen sometimes extorted a papal indulgence granting the right of presentation for a limited time; on which occasions she showed such alacrity, that she is known to have disposed, in a single day, of more than twenty prebends and inferior dignities. At other times, when the nomination made by his Holiness, as not unfrequently happened, was distasteful to her, she would take care to defeat it by forbidding the bull to be published until laid before the privy council; at the same time sequestrating the revenues of the vacant benefice till her own requisitions were complied with.†

She was equally solicitous in watching over the morals of the clergy, inculcating on the higher prelates to hold frequent pastoral communication with their suffragans, and to report to her such as were delinquent.‡ By these vigilant measures she suc-

their application, to shield them from the encroachments of the civil tribunals. Riol, Informe, apud Semanario Erudito, tom. iii. pp. 98, 99.

* See Part I. chapter vi. of this History.

† See examples of this, in Riol, Informe, apud Semanario Erudito, tom. iii. pp. 95—102. —Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 14.

‡ Riol, Informe, apud Semanario Erudito, tom. iii. p. 94.—

ceeded in restoring the ancient discipline of the church, and weeding out the sensuality and indolence which had so long defiled it ; while she had the inexpressible satisfaction to see the principal places, long before her death, occupied by prelates whose learning and religious principle gave the best assurance of the stability of the reformation.* Few of the Castilian monarchs have been brought more frequently into collision, or pursued a bolder policy, with the court of Rome. Still fewer have extorted from it such important graces and concessions ; a circumstance which can only be imputed, says a Castilian writer, “to singular good fortune and consummate prudence ;” † to that deep conviction of the queen’s integrity, we may also add, which disarmed resistance, even in her enemies.

The condition of the commons under this reign was probably, on the whole, more prosperous than in any other period of the Spanish history. New avenues to wealth and honours were opened to them ; and persons and property were alike pro-

L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 182.

* Oviedo bears emphatic testimony to this. “En nuestros tiempos há habido en España de nuestra Nacion grandes varones Letrados, excelentes Perlados y Religiosos y personas que por sus habilidades y ciencias hán subido á las mas altas dignidades de Capelos é de Arzobispados y todo lo que mas se puede alcanzar, en la Iglesia de Dios.” Quincuagenas, MS. dial. de Talavera.

† “Lo que debe admirar es, que en el tiempo mismo que se contendia con tanto ardor, obtuvieron los Reyes de la santa Sede mas gracias y privilegios que ninguno de sus sucesores ; prueba de su felicidad, y de su prudentísima conducta.” Riol, Informe, apud Semanario Erudito, tom. iii. p. 95.

tected under the fearless and impartial administration of the law. "Such was the justice dispensed to every one under this auspicious reign," exclaims Marinæo, "that nobles and cavaliers, citizens and labourers, rich and poor, masters and servants, all equally partook of it." * We find no complaints of arbitrary imprisonment ; and no attempts, so frequent both in earlier and later times, at illegal taxation. In this particular, indeed, Isabella manifested the greatest tenderness for her people. By her commutation of the capricious tax of the alcavala for a determinate one, and still more by transferring its collection from the revenue officers to the citizens themselves, she greatly relieved her subjects.†

Finally, notwithstanding the perpetual call for troops for the military operations in which the government was constantly engaged, and notwith-

* " Porque la igualdad de la justicia que los bienaventurados Principes hazian era tal, que todos los hombres de qualquier condicion que fuessen: aora nobles, y caualleros: aora plebeyos, y labradores, y ricos, o pobres, flacos, o fuertes, señores, o sieruos en lo que a la justicia tocaua todos fuessen iguales." Cosas Memorables, fol. 180.

† These beneficial changes were made with the advice, and through the agency of Ximenes. (Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 24. — Quintanilla, Archetypo, p. 181.) The alcavala, a tax of one-tenth on all transfers of property, produced more than any other branch of the revenue. As it was originally designed, more than a century before, to furnish funds for the Moorish war, Isabella, as we have seen in her testament, entertained great scruples as to the right to continue it, without the confirmation of the people, after that was terminated. Ximenes recommended its abolition, without any qualification, to Charles V ; but in vain. (Idem auct. ubi supra.) Whatever be thought of its legality, there can be no doubt it was one of the most successful means ever devised by a government for shackling the industry and enterprise of its subjects.

standing the example of neighbouring countries, there was no attempt to establish that iron bulwark of despotism, a standing army ; at least, none nearer than that of the voluntary levies of the hermandad, raised and paid by the people. The queen never admitted the arbitrary maxims of Ximenes in regard to the foundation of government. Hers was essentially one of opinion, not force.* Had it rested on any other than the broad basis of public opinion, it could not have withstood a day the violent shocks to which it was early exposed, nor have achieved the important revolution that it finally did, both in the domestic and foreign concerns of the country.

The condition of the kingdom, on Isabella's accession, necessarily gave the commons unwonted consideration. In the tottering state of her affairs, she was obliged to rest on their strong arm for support. It did not fail her. Three sessions of the legislature, or rather the popular branch of it, were held during the two first years of her reign. It was in these early assemblies that the commons bore an active part in concocting the wholesome system of laws which restored vitality and vigour to the exhausted republic.*

* A pragmatic was issued, September 18th, 1495, prescribing the weapons and the seasons for a regular training of the militia. The preamble declares, that it was made at the instance of the representatives of the cities and the nobles, who complained that, in consequence of the tranquillity which the kingdom, through the divine mercy, had for some years enjoyed, the people were very generally unprovided with arms, offensive or defensive, having sold or suffered them to fall into decay, insomuch that, in their present condition, they would be found wholly unprepared to meet either domestic disturbance, or foreign invasion. (Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 83.) What a tribute does this afford, in this age of violence, to the mild, paternal character of the administration !

After this good work was achieved, the sessions of that body became more rare. There was less occasion for them, indeed, during the existence of the hermandad, which was, of itself, an ample representation of the Castilian commons, and which, by enforcing obedience to the law at home, and by liberal supplies for foreign war, superseded, in a great degree, the call for more regular meetings of cortes.† The habitual economy, too, not to say frugality, which regulated the public as well as private expenditure of the sovereigns, enabled them, after this period, with occasional exceptions, to dispense with other aid than that drawn from the regular revenues of the crown.

There is every ground for believing that the political franchises of the people, as then understood, were uniformly respected. The number of cities summoned to cortes, which had so often varied according to the caprice of princes, never fell short of that prescribed by long usage. On the contrary, an addition was made by the conquest of Granada;

* The most important were those of Madrigal, in 1476, and of Toledo, in 1480, to which I have often had occasion to refer. "Las mas notables," say Asso and Manuel, in reference to the latter, "y famosas de este Reynado, en el qual podemos asegurar, que tuvo principio el mayor aumento, y arreglo de nuestra Jurisprudencia." (Instituciones, Introd. p. 91.) Marina notices this cortes with equal panegyric. (Teoría, tom. i. p. 75.) See also Sempere, Hist. des Cortès, p. 197.

† See Part I. chapters x. xi. et alibi.

and, in a cortes held soon after the queen's death, we find a most narrow and impolitic remonstrance of the legislature itself, against the alleged unauthorized extension of the privilege of representation.*

In one remarkable particular, which may be thought to form a material exception to the last observations, the conduct of the crown deserves to be noticed. This was the promulgation of pragmáticas, or royal ordinances, and that to a greater extent, probably, than under any other reign, before or since. This important prerogative was claimed and exercised, more or less freely, by most European sovereigns in ancient times. Nothing could be more natural than that the prince should assume such authority ; or that the people, blind to the ultimate consequences, and impatient of long or frequent sessions of the legislature, should acquiesce in the temperate use of it. As far as these ordinances were of an executive character, or designed as supplementary to parliamentary enactments, or in obedience to previous suggestions of

* At Valladolid, in 1506. The number of cities having right of representation, "que acostumbran continuamente embiar procuradores á cortes," according to Pulgar, was seventeen. (Reyes Católicos, cap. xcv.) This was before Granada was added. Martyr, writing some years after that event, enumerates only sixteen as enjoying the privilege. (Opus Epist. epist. cccclx.) Pulgar's estimate, however, is corroborated by the petition of the cortes of Valladolid, which, with more than usual effrontery, would limit the representation to eighteen cities, as prescribed "por algunas leyes é inmemorial uso." Marina, Teoría, tom. i. p. 161.

cortes, they appear to lie open to no constitutional objections in Castile.* But it was not likely that limits, somewhat loosely defined, would be very nicely observed; and under preceding reigns this branch of prerogative had been most intolerably abused.†

A large proportion of these laws are of an economical character, designed to foster trade and manufactures, and to secure fairness in commercial dealings.‡ Many are directed against the growing

* Many of these pragmáticas purport, in their preambles, to be made at the demand of cortes; many more at the petition of corporations or individuals; and many from the good pleasure of the sovereigns, bound to "remedy all grievances, and provide for the exigencies of the state." These ordinances very frequently are stated to have been made with the advice of the royal council. They were proclaimed in the public squares of the city in which they were executed, and afterwards in those of the principal towns in the kingdom. The Doctors Asso and Manuel divide pragmáticas into two classes; those made at the instance of cortes, and those emanating from the "sovereign, as supreme legislator of the kingdom, moved by his anxiety for the common weal." "Muchas de este género," they add, "contiene el libro raro intitulado Pragmáticas del Reyno, que se imprimió la primera vez en Alcalá en 1528." (Instituciones, Introd p. 110.) This is an error; — see p. 535, note ‡, infra.

† "Por la presente premática-sencion," said John II, in one of his ordinances, "lo cual todo é cada cosa dello é parte dello quiero é mando é ordeno que se guarde é cumpla daqui adelante para siempre jamás en todas las cibdades é villas é logares non embargante cualesquier leyes é fueros é derechos é ordenamientos, constituciones é posesiones é premáticas-senciones, é usos é costumbres, ca en cuanto á est oatañe yo los abrogo é derogo." Marina, Teoría, tom. ii. p. 216.) This was the very essence of despotism, and John found it expedient to retract these expressions on the subsequent remonstrance of cortes.

‡ Indeed, it is worthy of remark, as evincing the progress of civilization under this reign, that most of the criminal legislation is to be referred to its commencement, while the laws of the subsequent period chiefly concern the new relations which spirit of luxury, and many more occupied with the organization of the public tribunals. Whatever be thought of their wisdom in some cases, it will not be easy to detect any attempt to innovate on the settled principles of criminal jurisprudence, or on those regulating the transfer of property. When these were to be discussed, the sovereigns were careful to call in the aid of the legislature; an example which found little favour with their successors.* It is good evidence of the public confidence in the government, and the generally beneficial scope of these laws, that, although of such unprecedented frequency, they should have escaped parliamentary animadversion.† But, however patriotic grow out of an increased domestic industry. It is in the “Ordenanças Reales,” and “Leyes de la Hermandad,” both published by 1485, that we must look for the measures against violence and rapine.

* Thus, for example, the important criminal laws of the Hermandad, and the civil code called the “Laws of Toro,” were made under the express sanction of the commons. (Leyes de la Hermandad, fol. 1.—Quaderno de las Leyes y Nuevas Decisiones hechas y ordenadas en la Ciudad de Toro, [Medina del Campo, 1555,] fol. 49.) Nearly all, if not all, the acts of the Catholic sovereigns introduced into the famous code of the “Ordenanças Reales,” were passed in the cortes of Madrigal, in 1476, or Toledo, in 1480.

† It should be stated, however, that the cortes of Valladolid, in 1506, two years after the queen’s death, enjoined Philip and Joanna to make no laws without the consent of cortes; remonstrating, at the same time, against the existence of many royal pragmáticas, as an evil to be redressed. “*Y por esto se estableció lei que no hiciesen ni renovasen leyes sino en cortes. * * * *  Y porque fuera de esta órden se han hecho muchas premáticas de que estos vuestros reynos se tienen por agraviados, manden que aquellas se revean y provean y remedien los agravios que las tales premáticas tienen.” (Marina, Teoría, tom. ii. p. 218.)

the intentions of the Catholic sovereigns, and however safe, or even salutary, the power intrusted to such hands, it was a fatal precedent, and under the Austrian dynasty became the most effectual lever for overturning the liberties of the nation.

The preceding remarks on the policy observed towards the commons in this reign must be further understood as applying with far less qualification to the queen than to her husband. The latter, owing perhaps to the lessons which he had derived from his own subjects of Aragon, "who never abated one jot of their constitutional rights," says Martyr, "at the command of a king,"* and whose meetings generally brought fewer supplies to the royal coffers than grievances to redress, seems to have had little relish for popular assemblies. He convened them as rarely as possible in Aragon,† and, when he did, omitted no effort to influence their deliberations.‡ He anticipated, perhaps, similar

Whether this is to be understood of the ordinances of the reigning sovereigns, or their predecessors, may be doubted. It is certain, that the nation, however it may have acquiesced in the exercise of this power by the late queen would not have been content to resign it to such incompetent hands as those of Philip and his crazy wife.

* "Liberi patriis legibus, nil imperio Regis gubernantur." Opus Epist. epist. cccxxxviii.

† Capmany, however, understates the number, when he limits it to four sessions only during this whole reign. Práctica y Estilo, p. 62.

‡ See vol. iii. p. 122., note*, of this History. — "Si quis aliquid," says Martyr, speaking of a cortes general held at Monzon, by Queen Germaine, "sibi contra jus illatum putat, aut à regiâ coronâ quæquam deberi existimat, nunquam dissolvuntur conventus, donec conquerenti satisfiat, neque Regibus parere in exigendis pecuniis, solent aliter. Regina quotidie scribit, se vexari eorum petitioni-difficulties in Castile, after his second marriage had lost him the affections of the people : at any rate, he evaded calling them together on more than one occasion imperiously demanded by the constitution ;* and, when he did so, he invaded their privileges,† and announced principles of government‡ which formed a discreditable, and, it must bus, nec exsolvere se quire, quod se maximè optare ostendit. Rex imminentis necessitatis bellicæ vim proponit, ut in aliud tempus querelas differant, per literas, per nuntios, per ministros, conventum præsidentesque hortatur monetque, et summissis ferè verbis rogare videtur." 1512. (Opus Epist. epist. cccxciii.) Blancas notices Ferdinand's astuteness, who, instead of money granted by the Aragonese with difficulty and reservations, usually applied for troops at once, which were furnished and paid by the state. (Modo de Proceder, fol. 100, 101.) Zurita tells us, that both the king and queen were averse to meetings of cortes in Castile oftener than absolutely necessary ; and both took care, on such occasions, to have their own agents near the deputies, to influence their proceedings. " Todas las vezes que en lo passado el Rey, y la Reyna Doña Isabel llamauan à cortes en Castilla, temian de las llamar: y despues de llamados, y ayuntados los procuradores, ponian tales personas de su parte, que continuamente se juntassen con ellos ; por escusar lo que podria resultar de aquellos ayuntamientos : y tambien por darles à entender, que no tenian tanto poder, quanto ellos se imaginauan." (Anales, tom. vi. fol. 96.) This course is as repugnant to Isabella's character as it is in keeping with her husband's. Under their joint administration, it is not always easy to discriminate the part which belongs to each. Their respective characters, and political conduct in affairs where they were separately concerned, furnish us a pretty safe clue to our judgment in others.

* As, for example, both when he resigned, and resumed the regency. See Part II. chapters xvii. xx.

† In the first cortes after Isabella's death, at Toro, in 1505, Ferdinand introduced the practice, which has since obtained, of administering an oath of secrecy to the deputies as to the proceedings of the session ; a serious wound to popular representation. (Marina, Teoría, tom. i. p. 273.) Capmany (Práctica y Estilo, p. 232,) errs in describing this as " un arteficio Maquiavélico inventado por la política Alemana." The German Machiavelism has quite sins enough in this way to answer for.

‡ The introductory law to be admitted, rare exception to the usual tenor of his administration. Indeed, the most honourable testimony is borne to its general equity and patriotism, by a cortes convened soon after the queen's death, when the tribute, as far as she was concerned, still more unequivocally, must have been sincere.* A similar testimony is afforded by the panegyrics and the practice of the more liberal Castilian writers who freely resort to this reign as the great fountain of constitutional precedent.†

The commons gained political consideration, no doubt, by the depression of the nobles ; but their chief gain lay in the inestimable blessings of domestic tranquillity, and the security of private rights. The crown absorbed the power, in whatever form, retrieved from the privileged orders ; the pensions and large domains, the numerous fortified places, the rights of seignorial jurisdiction, the command of the military orders, and the like. Other circumstances conspired to raise the regal authority still higher ; as, for example, the international relations then opened with the rest of Europe, which, whether the "Leyes de Toro" holds this strange language ; "Y porque al rey pertenesce y ha poder de hazer fueros y leyes, y de las interpretar y emendar donde vieren que cumple," &c. (Leyes de Toro, fol. 2.) What could John II, or any despot of the Austrian line, claim more !

* See the address of the cortes, in Marina, Teoría, tom. i. p. 282.

† Among the writers repeatedly cited by me, it is enough to point out the citizen Marina, who has derived more illustrations of his liberal theory of the constitution from the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella than from any other ; and who loses no opportunity of panegyric on their "paternal government," and of contrasting it with the tyrannical policy of later times.

friendly or hostile, were conducted by the monarch alone, who, unless to obtain supplies, rarely condescended to seek the intervention of the other estates ; the concentration of the dismembered provinces of the Peninsula under one government ; the immense acquisitions abroad, whether from discovery or conquest, regarded in that day as the property of the crown, rather than of the nation ; and, finally, the consideration flowing from the personal character, and long successful rule, of the Catholic sovereigns. Such were the manifold causes which, without the imputation of a criminal ambition, or indifference to the rights of their subjects, in Ferdinand and Isabella, all combined to swell the prerogative to an unprecedented height under their reign.

This, indeed, was the direction in which all the governments of Europe, at this period, were tending. The people, wisely preferring a single master to a multitude, sustained the crown in its efforts to recover from the aristocracy the enormous powers it so grossly abused. This was the revolution of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The power thus deposited in a single hand was found in time equally incompatible with the great ends of civil government, while it gradually accumulated to an extent which threatened to crush the monarchy by its own weight. But the institutions derived from a Teutonic origin have been found to possess a conservative principle, unknown to the fragile despotisms of the East. The seeds of liberty, though dormant, lay deep in the heart of the nation, waiting only the good time to germinate. That time has at length arrived. Larger experience, and a wider moral culture, have taught men not only the extent of their political rights, but the best way to secure them; and it is the reassertion of these by the great body of the people, which now constitutes the revolution going forward in most of the old communities of Europe. The progress of liberal principles must be controlled, of course, by the peculiar circumstances and character of the nation; but their ultimate triumph, in every quarter, none can reasonably distrust. May it not be abused!

The prosperity of the country under Ferdinand and Isabella, its growing trade and new internal relations, demanded new regulations, which, as before noticed, were attempted to be supplied by the pragmáticas. This was adding, however, to the embarrassments of a jurisprudence already far too cumbersome. The Castilian lawyer might despair of a critical acquaintance with the voluminous mass of legislation, which, in the form of municipal charters, Roman codes, parliamentary statutes, and royal ordinances, were received as authority in the courts.* The manifold evils resulting from this unsettled and

* Marina enumerates no less than nine separate codes of civil and municipal law in Castile, by which the legal decisions were to be regulated, in Ferdinand and Isabella's time. En-sayo Historico-Critico, sobre la Antigua Legislacion de Castilla, (Madrid, 1808,) pp. 383—386. —Asso y Manuel, Instituciones, Introd.

conflicting jurisprudence had led the legislature repeatedly to urge its digest into a more simple and uniform system. Some approach was made towards this in the code of the “Ordenanças Reales,” compiled in the early part of the queen’s reign.* The great body of pragmáticas, subsequently issued, were also collected into a separate volume by her command,† and printed the year before her death.‡

* See Part I. chapter vi. of this History.

† “A collection,” says Señor Clemencin, “of the last importance, and indispensable to a right understanding of the spirit of Isabella’s government, but, nevertheless, little known to Castilian writers, not excepting the most learned of them.” (Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. ix.) No edition of the Pragmáticas has appeared since the publication of Philip II.’s “Nueva Recopilacion,” in 1567, in which a large portion of them is embodied. The remainder having no further authority, the work has gradually fallen into oblivion; but, whatever be the cause, the fact is not very creditable to professional science in Spain.

‡ The earliest edition was at Alcalá de Henares, printed by Lanzalao Polono, in 1503. It was revised and prepared for the press by Johan Ramirez, secretary of the royal council, from whom the work is often called “Pragmáticas de Ramirez.” It passed through several editions by 1550. Clemencin (ubi supra) enumerates five; but his list is incomplete, as the one in my possession, probably the second, has escaped his notice. It is a fine old folio, in black letter, containing, in addition, some ordinances of Joanna, and the “Laws of Toro,” in 192 folios. On the last is this notice by the printer: “Fue ympressa la presente obra en la muy noble y muy leal cibdad de Seuilla, por Juan Varela ympressor de libros. Acabose a dos dias del mes de Otubre de mill y quinientos y veynte años.” The first leaf after the table of contents exhibits the motives of its publication. “E porqué como algunas de ellas (pragmáticas sanciones é cartas) ha mucho tiempo que se dieron, é otras se hicieron en diversos tiempos, estan derramadas por muchas partes, no se saben por todos, é aun muchas de las dichas justicias no tienen cumplida noticia de todas ellas, pareciendo ser necesario é provechoso; mandamos á los del nuestro consejo que las hiciesen juntar é corregir é impremir,” &c.

These two codes may therefore be regarded as embracing the ordinary legislation of her reign.

In 1505, the celebrated little code called "Leyes de Toro," from the place where the cortes was held, received the sanction of that body.* Its laws, eighty-four in number, and designed as supplementary to those already existing, are chiefly occupied with the rights of inheritance and marriage. It is here that the ominous term "mayorazgo" may be said to have been naturalized in Castilian jurisprudence.† The peculiar feature of these laws, aggravated in no slight degree by the glosses of the civilians,‡ is the facility which they give to entails; a fatal facility, which, chiming in with the pride and indolence natural to the Spanish character, ranks them among the most efficient agents of the decay of husbandry and the general impoverishment of the country.

* "Leyes de Toro," say Asso and Manuel, "veneradas tanto desde entonces, que se les dió el primer lugar de valimiento sobre todas las del Reyno." Instituciones, Introd. p. 95.

† See the sensible memorial of Jovellanos, "Informe al Real y Supremo Consejo en el Expediente de Ley Agraria." Madrid, 1795.

There have been several editions of this code since the first of 1505. (Marina, Ensayo, No. 450.) I have copies of two editions, in black letter, neither of them known to Marina; one, above noticed, printed at Seville in 1520; and the other at Medina del Campo in 1555, probably the latest. The laws were subsequently incorporated in the "Nueva Recopilacion."

‡ "Esta ley," says Jovellanos, "que los jurisconsultos llaman á boca llena injusta y bárbara, lo es mucho mas por la extension que los pragmáticos le dieron en sus comentarios." (Informe, p. 76, nota.) The edition of Medina del Campo, in 1555, is swelled by the commentaries of Miguel de Cifuentes, till the text, in the language of bibliographers, looks like "cymba in oceano."

Besides these codes, there were the “Leyes de la Hermandad,” * the “Quaderno de Alcavalas,” with others of less note for the regulation of trade, made in this reign.† But still the great scheme of a uniform digest of the municipal law of Castile, although it occupied the most distinguished jurisconsults of the time, was unattained at the queen’s death.‡ How deeply it engaged her mind in that hour is evinced by the clause in her codicil, in which she bequeaths the consummation of the work, as an imperative duty, to her successors.§ It was not com-

* Ante, Part I. chapter vi.

† Leyes del Quaderno Nuevo de las Rentas de las Alcavalas y Franquezas, hecho en la Vega de Granada, (Salamanca, 1550); a little code of 37 folios, containing 147 laws for the regulation of the crown rents. It was made in the Vega of Granada, December 10th, 1491. The greater part of these laws, like so many others of this reign, have been admitted into the “Nueva Recopilacion.”

‡ At the head of these, undoubtedly, must be placed Dr. Alfonso Diaz de Montalvo, noticed more than once in the course of this History. He illustrated three successive reigns by his labours, which he continued to the close of a long life, and after he had become blind. The Catholic sovereigns highly appreciated his services, and settled a pension on him of 30,000 maravedies. Besides his celebrated compilation of the “Ordenanças Reales,” he wrote commentaries on the ancient code of the “Fuero Real,” and on the “Siete Partidas,” printed for the first time under his own eye in 1491. (Mendez, Typographia Española, p. 183.) Marina (Ensayo, p. 405,) has bestowed a beautiful eulogium on this venerable lawyer, who first gave to light the principal Spanish codes, and introduced a spirit of criticism into the national jurisprudence.

§ This gigantic work was committed, wholly or in part, to Dr. Lorenzo Galindez de Carbajal. He laboured many years on it; but the results of his labours, as elsewhere noticed, have never been communicated to the public. See Asso y Manuel, Instituciones, pp. 50. 99. —Marina, Ensayo, pp. 392. 406.—and Clemencin, whose Ilust. ix. exhibits a most clear and satisfactory view of the legal compilations under this reign.

pleted till the reign of Philip the Second ; and the large proportion of Ferdinand and Isabella's laws, admitted into that famous compilation, shows the prospective character of their legislation, and the uncommon discernment with which it was accommodated to the peculiar genius and wants of the nation.*

The immense increase of empire, and the corresponding developement of the national resources, not only demanded new laws, but a thorough reorganization of every department of the administration. Laws may be received as indicating the dispositions of the ruler, whether for good or for evil ; but it is in the conduct of the tribunals that we are to read the true character of his government. It was the upright and vigilant administration of these which constituted the best claim of Ferdinand and Isabella to the gratitude of their country. To facilitate the despatch of business, it was distributed among a number of bureaus or councils, at the head of which stood the "royal council" whose authority and functions I have already noticed.† In order to leave this body

* Lord Bacon's comment on Henry VII.'s laws might apply with equal force to these of Ferdinand and Isabella. "Certainly his times for good commonwealth's laws did excel. * * * * For his laws, whose marks them well, are deep, and not vulgar ; not made upon the spur of a particular occasion for the present, but out of providence of the future, to make the estate of his people still more and more happy ; after the manner of the legislators in ancient and heroical times." Hist. of Henry VII, Works. (ed. 1819,) vol. v. p. 60.

† Ante, Part i. chapter vi.

more leisure for its executive duties, a new audience, or chancery, as it was called, was established at Valladolid in 1480, whose judges were drawn from the members of the king's council. A similar tribunal was instituted, after the Moorish conquests, in the southern division of the monarchy; and both had supreme jurisdiction over all civil causes, which were carried up to them from the inferior audiences throughout the kingdom.*

The "council of the supreme" was placed over the Inquisition with a special view to the interests of the crown; an end, however, which it very imperfectly answered, as appears from its frequent collision with the royal and secular jurisdictions.† The "council of the orders" had charge, as the name imports, of the great military fraternities,‡ The "council of Aragon" was intrusted with the general administration of that kingdom and its dependencies, including Naples; and had, besides, extensive jurisdiction as a court of appeal,§ Lastly,

* Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 24. 30. 39. — Recop. de las Leyes, (ed. 1640,) tom. i. lib. ii. tit. 5. leyes 1, 2, 3. 11, 12. 20; tit. 7. ley 1.—Ordenanças Reales, lib. ii. tit. 4.

The southern chancery, first opened at Ciudad Real, in 1494, was subsequently transferred by the sovereigns to Granada.

† Ante, vol. i. p. 370, note.*

‡ Ante, vol. i. p. 322, note.

§ Riol, Informe, apud Semario Erudito, tom. iii. p. 149.

—It consisted of a vice-chancellor as president, and six ministers, two from each of the three provinces of the crown. It was consulted by the king on all appointments and matters of government. The Italian department was committed to a separate tribunal, called the council of Italy, in 1556. Capmany (Mem. de Barcelona, tom. iv. Apend. xvii.) has explained at length the functions and authority of this institution.

the "council of the Indies" was instituted by Ferdinand, in 1511, for the control of the American department. Its powers, comprehensive as they were in its origin, were so much enlarged under Charles the Fifth and his successors, that it became the depository of all law, the fountain of all nominations both ecclesiastical and temporal, and the supreme tribunal, where all questions, whether of government or trade in the colonies, were finally adjudicated.*

Such were the forms which the government assumed under the hands of Ferdinand and Isabella. The great concerns of the empire were brought under the control of a few departments, which looked to the crown as their common head. The chief stations were occupied by lawyers, who were alone competent to the duties; and the precincts of the court swarmed with a loyal militia, who, as

* See the nature and broad extent of these powers, in Recop. de Leyes de las Indias, tom. i. lib. ii. tit. 2, leyes 1, 2.—Also Solorzano, Política Indiana, tom. ii. lib. v. cap. xv. who goes no further back than the remodeling of this tribunal under Charles V.—Riol, Informe, apud Semanario Erudito, tom. iii. pp. 159, 160.

The third volume of the Semanario Erudito, pp. 73—233, contains a report, drawn up by command of Philip V. in 1726, by Don Santiago Agustin Riol, on the organization and state of the various tribunals, civil and ecclesiastical, under Ferdinand and Isabella; together with an account of the papers contained in their archives. It is an able memorial, replete with curious information. It is singular that this interesting and authentic document should have been so little consulted, considering the popular character of the collection in which it is preserved. I do not recollect ever to have met with a reference to it in any author. It was by mere accident, in the absence of a general index, that I stumbled on it in the mari magno in which it is ingulfed.

they owed their elevation to its patronage, were not likely to interpret the law to the disparagement of prerogative.*

The greater portion of the laws of this reign are directed, in some form or other, as might be expected, to commerce and domestic industry. Their very large number, however, implies an extraordinary expansion of the national energy and resources, as well as a most earnest disposition in the government to foster them. The wisdom of these efforts, at all times, is not equally certain. I will briefly enumerate a few of the most characteristic and important provisions.

By a pragmatic of 1500, all persons, whether natives or foreigners, were prohibited from shipping goods in foreign bottoms, from a port where a Spanish ship could be obtained.† Another prohibited the sale of vessels to foreigners.‡ Another offered a large premium on all vessels of a certain tonnage and upwards;§ and others held out protection and various immunities to seamen.|| The

* “Pusieron los Reyes Católicos,” says the penetrating Mendoza, “el gobierno de la justicia, i cosas públicas en manos de Letrados, gente media entre los grandes i pequeños, sin ofensa de los unos ni de los otros. Cuya profesion eran letras legales, comedimiento, secreto, verdad, vida llana, i sin corrupcion de costumbres.” Guerra de Granada, p. 15.

† Granada, September 3rd.

Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 135. —A pragmatic of similar import was issued by Henry VIII. Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. i. Introd. p. 46.

‡ Granada, August 11th, 1501. Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 137.

§ Alfaro, November 10th, 1495. Ibid. fol. 136.

|| See a number of these, collected by Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, Introd. pp. 43, 44.

drift of the first of these laws, like that of the famous English navigation act, so many years later, was, as the preamble sets forth, to exclude foreigners from the carrying trade; and the others were equally designed to build up a marine, for the defence as well as commerce of the country. In this, the sovereigns were favoured by their important colonial acquisitions, the distance of which, moreover, made it expedient to employ vessels of greater burthen than those hitherto used. The language of subsequent laws, as well as various circumstances within our knowledge, attest the success of these provisions. The number of vessels in the merchant service of Spain, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, amounted to a thousand, according to Campomanes.* We may infer the flourishing condition of their commercial marine from their military, as shown in the armaments sent at different times against the Turks, or the Barbary corsairs.† The convoy which accompanied the Infanta Joanna to Flanders, in 1496, consisted of one hundred and thirty vessels, great and small, having a force of more than twenty thousand men on board; a formidable equipment, inferior only to that of the far-famed "Invincible Armada."‡

* Cited by Robertson, History of America, vol. iii. p. 305.

† The fleet fitted out against the Turks, in 1482, consisted of seventy sail, and that under Gonsalvo, in 1500, of sixty, large and small. (Ante, Part I. chapter vi; Part II. chapter x.) See other expeditions, enumerated by Navarrete Coleccion de Viages, tom. i. p. 50.

‡ Cura de los Palacios, MS.

A pragmatic was passed in 1491, at the petition of the inhabitants of the northern provinces, requiring English and other foreign traders to take their returns in the fruits or merchandise of the country, and not in gold or silver. This law seems to have been designed less to benefit the manufacturer than to preserve the precious metals in the country.* It was the same in purport with other laws prohibiting the exportation of these metals, whether in coin or bullion. They were not new in Spain, nor indeed peculiar to her.† They proceeded on the principle that gold and silver, independently of their value as a commercial medium, constituted, in a peculiar cap. cliii. who, indeed, estimates the complement of this fleet at 25,000 men; a round number, which must certainly include seamen of every description. The Invincible Armada consisted, according to Dunham, of about 130 vessels, large and small, 20,000 soldiers, and 8,000 seamen. (History of Spain and Portugal, vol. v. p. 59.) The estimate falls below that of most writers.

* En el real de la vega de Granada, December 20th. (Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 133.) “Y les apercibays,” enjoins the ordinance, “que los marauedis porque los vendieren los han de sacar de nuestros reynos en mercaderias: y ni en oro ni en plata ni en moneda amonedada de manera que no pueden pretender ygnorancia: y den fianças llanas y abonadas de lo fazer y cumplir assi: y si fallaredes que sacan

o lleuan oro o plata o moneda contra el tenor y forma de las dichas leyes y desta nuestra carta mandamos vos que gelo torneys: y sea perdido como las dichas leyes mandan, y demas cayan y incurran en las penas en las leyes de nuestros reynos contenidas contra los que sacan oro o plata o moneda fuera dellos sin nuestra licencia y mandado: las quales executad en ellos y en sus fiadores.”

† Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 92. 134. — These laws were as old as the fourteenth century in Castile, and had been renewed by every succeeding monarch, from the time of John I. (Ordenanças Reales, lib. vi. tit. 9. leyes 17—22.) Similar ones were passed under the contemporary princes, Henry VII. and VIII. of England, James IV. of Scotland, &c.

sense, the wealth of a country. This error, common, as I have said, to other European nations, was eminently fatal to Spain, since the produce of its native mines before the discovery of America,* and of those in that quarter afterwards, formed its great staple. As such, these metals should have enjoyed every facility for transportation to other countries, where their higher value would afford a corresponding profit to the exporter.

The sumptuary laws of Ferdinand and Isabella are open, for the most part, to the same objections with those just noticed. Such laws, prompted in a great degree, no doubt, by the declamations of the clergy against the pomp and vanities of the world, were familiar, in early times, to most European states. There was ample scope for them in Spain, where the example of their Mōslem neighbours had done much to infect all classes with a fondness for sumptuous apparel, and a showy magnificence of living. Ferdinand and Isabella fell nothing short of the most zealous of their predecessors in their efforts to restrain this improvident luxury. They did, however, what few princes on the like occasions have done, — enforced the precept by their own example. Some idea of their habitual economy, or rather frugality, may be formed from a re-

* — “ Balucis malleator Hispanæ,” says Martial, noticing the noise made by the gold-beaters hammering out the Spanish ore, as one of the chief annoyances which drove him from the capital. (Lib. xii. ep. lvii.) See also the precise statement of Pliny, cited Part I. chapter viii. of this History.

monstrance presented by the commons to Charles the Fifth, soon after his accession, which represents his daily household expenses as amounting to one hundred and fifty thousand maravedies, while those of the Catholic sovereigns were rarely fifteen thousand, or one-tenth of that sum.*

They passed several salutary laws for restraining the ambitious expenditure at weddings and funerals, as usual most affected by those who could least afford it.† In 1494, they issued a pragmatic, prohibiting the importation or manufacture of brocades, or of gold or silver embroidery, and also plating with these metals. The avowed object was to check the growth of luxury and the waste of the precious metals.‡

These provisions had the usual fate of laws of this kind. They gave an artificial and still higher value to the prohibited article. Some evaded them ;

* “ Porque haciéndose ansi al modo é costumbre de los dichos señores Reyes pasados, cesarán los inmensos gastos y sin provecho que en la mesa é casa de S. M. se hacen; pues el daño desto notoriamente paresce porque se halla en el plato real y en los platos que se hacen á los privados é criados de su casa gastarse cada un dia ciento y cincuenta mil maravedis ; y los católicos Reyes D. Hernando é Doña Isabel, seyendo tan excelentes y tan poderosos, en su plato y en el plato del príncipe D. Joan que haya glória, é de las señoras infantas con gran número y multitud de damas no se gastar cada un dia, seyendo mui abastados como de tales Reyes, mas de doce á quince mil maravedís.” Petición de la Junta de Tordesillas, October 20th, 1520, apud Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 230.

† In 1493; repeated in 1501. Recop. de las Leyes, tom. ii. fol. 3.—In 1502. Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 139.

‡ At Segovia, September 2nd ; also in 1496 and 1498. Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 123. 125, 126.

others indemnified themselves for the privation by some other and scarcely less expensive variety of luxury; such, for example, were the costly silks which came into more general use after the conquest of Granada. But here the government, on remonstrance of the cortes, again interposed its prohibition, restricting the privilege of wearing them to certain specified classes.* Nothing, obviously, could be more impolitic than these various provisions directed against manufactures which, under proper encouragement, or indeed without any, from the peculiar advantages afforded by the country, might have formed an important branch of industry, whether for the supply of foreign markets, or for home consumption.

Notwithstanding these ordinances, we find one in 1500, at the petition of the silk-growers in Granada, against the introduction of silk thread from the kingdom of Naples;† thus encouraging the production of the raw material, while they interdicted the uses to which it could be applied. Such are the inconsistencies into which a government is betrayed by an over-zealous and impertinent spirit of legislation!

* At Granada, in 1499. — This on petition of cortes, in the year preceding. Sempere, in his sensible “Historia del Luxo,” has exhibited the series of the manifold sumptuary laws in Castile. It is a history of the impotent struggle of authority against the indulgence of the innocent propensities implanted in our nature, and naturally increasing with increasing wealth and civilization.

† En la nombrada y gran cibdad de Granada, Agosto 20. Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 135.

The chief exports of the country in this reign were, the fruits and natural products of the soil, the minerals, of which a great variety was deposited in its bosom, and the simpler manufactures, as sugar, dressed skins, oil, wine, steel, &c.* The breed of Spanish horses, celebrated in ancient times, had been greatly improved by the cross with the Arabian : it had, however, of late years, fallen into neglect, until the government, by a number of judicious laws, succeeded in restoring it to such repute, that this noble animal became an extensive article of foreign trade.† But the chief staple of the country was wool, which, since the introduction of English sheep at the close of the fourteenth century, had reached a degree of fineness and beauty that enabled it, under the present reign, to compete with any other in Europe.‡

* Pragmáticas del Reyno, passim.—Diccionario Geográfico-Hist. de España, tom. i. p. 333.—Capmany, Mem. de Barcelona, tom. iii. part. iii. cap. ii.

† Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 127, 128.—Ante, vol. ii. p. 439, note †. — The cortes of Toledo, in 1525, complained, “que habia tantos caballos Españoles en Francia como en Castilla.” (Mem. de la Acad de Hist. tom. vi. p. 285.) The trade, however, was contraband ; the laws against the exportation of horses being as ancient as the time of Alphonso XI. (See also Ordenanças Reales, fol. 85, 86.)

Laws can never permanently avail against national prejudices. Those in favour of mules have been so strong in the Peninsula, and such the consequent decay of the fine breed of horses, that the Spaniards have been compelled to supply themselves with the latter from abroad. Bourgoing reckons that 20,000 were annually imported into the country from France at the close of the last century, tom. i. chap. iv.

‡ Hist. del Luxo, tom. i. p. 170.—“ Tiene muchas ouejas,” says Marinæo, “cuya lana es tan singular, que no solamente se aprouechan della en España, mas tambien se lleua en abundancia a otras partes.” (Cosas

To what extent the finer manufactures were carried, or made an article of export, is uncertain. The vagueness of statistical information in these early times has given rise to much crude speculation and to extravagant estimates of their resources, which have been met by a corresponding scepticism in later and more scrutinizing critics. Capmany, the most acute of these, has advanced the opinion, that the coarser cloths only were manufactured in Castile, and those exclusively for home consumption.* The royal ordinances, however, imply, in the character and minuteness of their regulations, a very considerable proficiency in many of the mechanic arts.† Similar testimony is borne by intelligent foreigners, visiting or residing in the country at the beginning of the sixteenth century, who notice the fine cloths and manufacture of arms in Segovia,‡ the silks and velvets of Granada and Valencia,§ the woollen and silk fabrics of Toledo, which gave employment to ten thousand artisans,||

Memorables, fol. 3.) He notices especially the fine wool of Molina, in whose territory 400,000 sheep pastured, fol. 19.

* Mem. de Barcelona, tom. iii. pp. 338, 339.—“Or if ever exported,” he adds, “it was at some period long posterior to the discovery of America.”

† Pragmáticas del Reyno, passim. — Many of them were designed to check impositions, too often practised in the manufacture and sale of goods, and to keep them up to a fair standard.

‡ L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 11.

§ Ibid. fol. 19.—Navagiero, Viaggio, fol. 26.—The Venetian minister, however, pronounces them inferior to the silks of his own country.

|| “Proueyda,” says Marinæo, “de todos officios, y artes mecánicas que en ella se exercitan mucho: y principalmente en lanor, y exercicio de lanas, y sedas. Por las quales dos cosas biuen en esta ciudad mas de diez mil personas. Es de mas

the curiously-wrought plate of Valladolid,* and the fine cutlery and glass manufactures of Barcelona, rivalling those of Venice.†

The recurrence of seasons of scarcity, and the fluctuation of prices, might suggest a reasonable distrust of the excellence of the husbandry under this reign.‡ The turbulent condition of the country may account for this pretty fairly during the early part of it. Indeed, a neglect of agriculture, to the extent implied by these circumstances, is wholly irreconcilable with the general tenor of Ferdinand and Isabella's legislation, which evidently relies on this as the main spring of national prosperity. It is equally repugnant, moreover, to the reports of foreigners, who could best compare the state of the country with that of others at the same period. They extol the fruitfulness of a soil which yielded the products of the most opposite climes; the hills desto la ciudad muy rica, por los grandes tratos de mercadurias." Cosas Memorables, fol. 12.

* Ibid. fol. 15.—Navagiero, a more parsimonious eulogist, remarks, nevertheless, "Sono in Valladolid assai artefici di ogni sorte, e se vi lavora benissimo de tutte le arti, e sopra tutto d'Argenti, e vi son tanti argenterii quanti non sono in due altre terre." Viaggio, fol. 35.

† Geron. Paulo, a writer at the close of the fifteenth century, cited by Capmany, Mem. de Barcelona, tom. i. part. iii. p. 23.

‡ The twentieth Ilustracion of Señor Clemencin's invaluable compilation contains a table of prices of grain, in different parts of the kingdom, under Ferdinand and Isabella. Take, for example, those of Andalusia. In 1488, a year of great abundance, the fanega of wheat sold in Andalusia for 50 maravedies; in 1489, it rose to 100; in 1505, a season of great scarcity, to 375, and even 600; in 1508, it was at 306; and in 1509, it had fallen to 85 maravedies. Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. pp. 551, 552.

clothed with vineyards and plantations of fruit-trees, much more abundant, it would seem, in the northern regions than at the present day ; the valleys and delicious vegas, glowing with the ripe exuberance of southern vegetation ; extensive districts, now smitten with the curse of barrenness, where the traveller scarce discerns the vestige of a road or of a human habitation, but which then teemed with all that was requisite to the sustenance of the populous cities in their neighbourhood.*

The inhabitant of modern Spain or Italy, who wanders amid the ruins of their stately cities, their grass-grown streets, their palaces and temples crumb-

* Compare, for example, the accounts of the environs of Toledo and Madrid, the two most considerable cities in Castile, by ancient and modern travellers. One of the most intelligent and recent of the latter, in his journey between these two capitals, remarks, " There is sometimes a visible track, and sometimes none ; most commonly we passed over wide sands. The country between Madrid and Toledo, I need scarcely say, is ill peopled and ill cultivated ; for it is all a part of the same arid plain that stretches on every side around the capital, and which is bounded on this side by the Tagus. The whole of the way to Toledo, I passed through only four inconsiderable villages, and saw two others at a distance. A great part of the land is uncultivated, covered with furze and aromatic plants ; but here and there some corn land is to be seen." (Inglis, Spain in 1830, vol. i. p. 366.) What a contrast does all this present to the language of the Italians, Navigiero and Marinæo, in whose time the country around Toledo "surpassed all other districts of Spain in the excellence and fruitfulness of the soil ;" which, "skilfully irrigated by the waters of the Tagus, and minutely cultivated, furnished every variety of fruit and vegetable produce to the neighbouring city." While, instead of the sunburnt plains around Madrid, it is described as situated "in the bosom of a fair country, with an ample territory, yielding rich harvests of corn and wine, and all the other aliments of life." Cosas Memorables, fol. 12, 13. — Viaggio, fol. 7, 8.

ling into dust, their massive bridges choking up the streams they once proudly traversed, the very streams themselves, which bore navies on their bosoms, shrunk into too shallow a channel for the meanest craft to navigate,—the modern Spaniard who surveys these vestiges of a giant race, the tokens of his nation's present degeneracy, must turn for relief to the prouder and earlier period of her history, when such great works could alone be achieved ; and it is no wonder that he should be led, in his enthusiasm, to invest it with a romantic and exaggerated colouring.* Such a period in Spain cannot be looked for in the last, still less in the seventeenth century, for the nation had then reached the lowest ebb of its fortunes ; † nor in the close of the sixteenth, for the desponding language of cortes shows that the work

* Capmany has well exposed some of these extravagances. (Mem. de Barcelona, tom. iii. part. iii. cap. ii.) The boldest of them, however, may find a warrant in the declarations of the legislature itself. “En los lugares de obrages de lanas,” asserts the cortes of 1594, “donde se solian labrar veinte y treinta mil arrobas, no se labran hoy seis, y donde habia señoras de ganado de grandisima cantidad, han disminuido en la misma y mayor proporcion, acaeciendo lo mismo en todas las otras cosas del comercio universal y particular. Lo cual hace que no haya ciudad de las principales destos réinos ni lugar ninguno, de donde no falte notable vecin-dad, como se echa bien de ver en la muchedumbre de casas que estan cerradas y despobladas, y en la baja que han dado los arrendamientos de las pocas que se arriendan y habitan.” Apud Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. p. 304.

† A point which most writers would probably agree in fixing at 1700, the year of Charles II.'s death, the last and most imbecile of the Austrian dynasty. The population of the kingdom, at this time, had dwindled to 6,000,000. See Laborde, (Itinéraire, tom. vi. pp. 125, 143 ; ed. 1830,) who seems to have better foundation for this census than for most of those in his table.

of decay and depopulation had then already begun.* It can only be found in the first half of that century, in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, and that of their successor Charles the Fifth ; in which last the state, under the strong impulse it had received, was carried onward in the career of prosperity, in spite of the ignorance and mismanagement of those who guided it.

There is no country which has been guilty of such wild experiments, or has showed, on the whole, such profound ignorance of the true principles of economical science, as Spain under the sceptre of the family of Austria ; and, as it is not always easy to discriminate between their acts and those of Ferdinand and Isabella, under whom the germs of much of the subsequent legislation may be said to have been planted, this circumstance has brought undeserved discredit on the government of the latter ; undeserved, because laws, mischievous in their eventual operation, were not always so at the time for which they were originally devised ; not to add, that what was intrinsically bad has been aggravated tenfold under the blind legislation of their successors.† It is also true, that many of the most ex-

* See the unequivocal language of cortes, under Philip II. (supra.) With every allowance, it infers an alarming decline in the prosperity of the nation.

† One has only to read, for an evidence of this, the lib. vi.

tit. 18. of the "Nueva Recopilacion," on "cosas prohibidas ;" the laws on gilding and plating, lib. v. tit. 24. ; on apparel and luxury, lib. vii. tit. 12 ; on woollen manufactures, lib. vii. tit. 14—17, et leges al. Perhaps no stronger proof

ceptionable laws sanctioned by their names are to be charged on their predecessors, who had engrafted their principles into the system long before;* and many others are to be vindicated by the general practice of other nations, which authorized retaliation on the score of self-defence.†

Nothing is easier than to parade abstract theorems—true in the abstract—in political economy; nothing harder than to reduce them to practice. That an individual will understand his own interests better than the government can, or, what is the of the degeneracy of the subsequent legislation can be given, than by contrasting it with that of Ferdinand and Isabella in two important laws. 1. The sovereigns, in 1492, required foreign traders to take their returns in the products and manufactures of the country. By a law of Charles V, in 1552, the exportation of numerous domestic manufactures was prohibited; and the foreign trader, in exchange for domestic wool, was required to import into the country a certain amount of linen and woollen fabrics. 2. By an ordinance, in 1500, Ferdinand and Isabella prohibited the importation of silk thread from Naples, to encourage its production at home. This appears from the tenor of subsequent laws to have perfectly succeeded. In 1552, however, a law was passed, interdicting the export of manufactured silk, and admitting the importation of the raw material.

By this sagacious provision, both the culture of silk, and the manufacture, were speedily crushed in Castile.

* See examples of these in the reigns of Henry III. and John II. (Recop. de las Leyes, tom. ii. fol. 180, 181.) Such also were the numerous tariffs fixing the prices of grain, the vexatious class of sumptuary laws, those for the regulation of the various crafts, and, above all, on the exportation of the precious metals.

† The English Statute Book alone will furnish abundant proof of this, in the exclusive regulations of trade and navigation existing at the close of the fifteenth century. Mr. Sharon Turner has enumerated many, under Henry VIII, of similar import with, and, indeed, more partial in their operation than, those of Ferdinand and Isabella. History of England, vol. iv. pp. 170 et seq.

same thing, that trade, if let alone, will find its way into the channels on the whole most advantageous to the community, few will deny. But what is true of all together is not true of any one singly ; and no one nation can safely act on these principles if others do not. In point of fact, no nation has acted on them since the formation of the present political communities of Europe. All that a new state, or a new government in an old one, can now propose to itself is, not to sacrifice its interests to a speculative abstraction, but to accommodate its institutions to the great political system of which it is a member. On these principles, and on the higher obligation of providing the means of national independence in its most extended sense, much that was bad in the economical policy of Spain, at the period under review, may be vindicated.

It would be unfair to direct our view to the restrictive measures of Ferdinand and Isabella, without noticing also the liberal tenor of their legislation in regard to a great variety of objects. Such, for example, are the laws encouraging foreigners to settle in the country ; * those for facilitating communication by internal improvements, roads, bridges, canals, on a scale of unprecedented magnitude ; † for a similar attention to the wants of navigation, by constructing moles, quays, lighthouses along the

* Ordenanças Reales, lib. vi. tit. 4. ley 6.

† Archivo de Simancas ; in which most of these ordinances appear to be registered. Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. xi.

coast, and deepening and extending the harbours, “to accommodate,” as the acts set forth, “the great increase of trade ;” for embellishing and adding in various ways to the accommodations of the cities ; * for relieving the subject from onerous tolls and oppressive monopolies ; † for establishing a uniform currency and standard of weights and measures throughout the kingdom, ‡ objects of unwearied solicitude through this whole reign ; for maintaining a police, which, from the most disorderly and dangerous, raised Spain, in the language of Martyr, to be the safest country in Christendom ; § for such equal justice as secured to every man the fruits of his own industry, inducing him to embark his capital in useful enterprises ; and, finally, for enforcing fidelity to contracts, || of which the sovereigns gave

* “Ennoblescense los cibdades é villas tener casas grandes é bien fechas en que fagan sus ayuntamientos é concejos,” &c. (Ordenanças Reales, lib. vii. tit. 1, ley 1.) Señor Clemencin has specified the nature and great variety of these improvements, as collected from the archives of the different cities of the kingdom. Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilustracion xi.

† Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 63. 91. 93.—Recop. de las Leyes, lib. v. tit. 11, ley 12. — Among the acts for restricting monopolies may be mentioned one which prohibited the nobility and great landholders from preventing their tenants opening inns and houses of entertainment without their especial license. (Pragmáticas del Reyno, 1492, fol. 96.) The same abuse, however, is noticed by Mad. d’Aulnoy, in her “Voyage d’Espagne,” as still existing, to the great prejudice of travellers, in the seventeenth century. Dunlop, Memoirs of Philip IV. and Charles II. vol. ii. chap. xi.

‡ Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 93—112.—Recop. de las Leyes, lib. v. tit. 21, 22.

§ “Ut nulla unquam per se tuta regio, tutiorem se fuisse jactare possit.” Opus Epist. epist. xxxi.

|| For various laws tending to secure this, and prevent frauds in trade, see Ordenanças Reales, lib. iii. tit. 8, ley 5.—Pragmásuch a glorious example in their own administration, as effectually restored that public credit which is the true basis of public prosperity.

While these important reforms were going on in the interior of the monarchy, it experienced a greater change in its external condition by the immense augmentation of its territory. The most important of its foreign acquisitions were those nearest home, Granada and Navarre ; at least, they were the ones most capable, from their position, of being brought under control, and thoroughly and permanently identified with the Spanish monarchy. Granada, as we have seen, was placed under the sceptre of Castile, governed by the same laws, and represented in its cortes, being, in the strictest sense, part and parcel of the kingdom. Navarre was also united to the same crown ; but its constitution, which bore considerable analogy to that of Aragon, remained substantially the same as before. The government, indeed, was administered by a viceroy ; but Ferdinand made as few changes as possible, permitting it to retain its own legislature, its ancient courts of law, and its laws themselves ; so the forms, if not the spirit of independence, continued to survive its union with the victorious state.*

The other possessions of Spain were scattered ticas del Reyno, fol. 45. 66, 67, et alibi.

* The fullest, though a sufficiently meagre account of the Navarrese constitution, is to be found in Capmany's collection,

"Práctica y Estilo," (pp. 250—258,) and in the "Diccionario Geográfico-Hist. de España," (tom. ii. pp. 140—143.) The historical and economical details in the latter are more copious.

over the various quarters of Europe, Africa, and America. Naples was the conquest of Aragon ; or, at least, made on behalf of that crown. The queen appears to have taken no part in the conduct of that war, whether distrusting its equity, or its expediency, in the belief that a distant possession in the heart of Europe would probably cost more to maintain than it was worth. In fact, Spain is the only nation, in modern times, which has been able to keep its hold on such possessions for any very considerable period ; a circumstance implying more wisdom in her policy than is commonly conceded to her. The fate of the acquisitions alluded to forms no exception to the remark ; and Naples, like Sicily, continued permanently ingrafted on the kingdom of Aragon.

A fundamental change in the institutions of Naples became requisite to accommodate them to its new relations. Its great offices of state and its legal tribunals were reorganized : its jurisprudence, which, under the Angevin race, and even the first Aragonese, had been adapted to French usages, was now modelled on the Spanish. The various innovations were conducted by the Catholic king with his usual prudence ; and the reform in the legislation is commended by a learned and impartial Italian civilian, as breathing a spirit of moderation and wisdom.*

* “ Queste furono,” says Giannone, “ le prime leggi che ci diedero gli Spagnuoli : leggi tutte provvide e savie, nello stabilir delle quali furono veramente gli Spagnuoli più d’ogni altra nazione avveduti, e più esatti imitatori de’ Romani.” Istoria di Napoli, lib. xxx. cap. v.

He conceded many privileges to the people, and to the capital especially, whose venerable university he resuscitated from the decayed state into which it had fallen, making liberal appropriations from the treasury for its endowment. The support of a mercenary army, and the burdens incident to the war, pressed heavily on the people during the first years of his reign ; but the Neapolitans, who, as already noticed, had been transferred too often from one victor to another to be keenly sensible to the loss of political independence, were gradually reconciled to his administration, and testified their sense of its beneficent character by celebrating the anniversary of his death, for more than two centuries, with public solemnities, as a day of mourning throughout the kingdom.*

But far the most important of the distant acquisitions of Spain were those secured to her by the genius of Columbus and the enlightened patronage

* Giannone, Istoria di Napoli, lib. xxix. cap. iv ; lib. xxx. cap. i. ii. v. — Signorelli, Coltura nelle Sicilie, tom. iv. p. 84.—Every one knows the persecutions, the exile, and long imprisonment, which Giannone suffered for the freedom with which he treated the clergy in his philosophical history. The generous conduct of Charles of Bourbon to his heirs is not so well known. Soon after his accession to the throne of Naples, that prince settled a liberal pension on the son of the historian, declaring, that “it did not comport with the honour and dignity of the government, to permit an individual to languish in indigence, whose parent had been the greatest man, the most useful to the state, and the most unjustly persecuted, that the age had produced.” Noble sentiments, giving additional grace to the act which they accompanied. See the decree, cited by Corniani, Secoli della Letteratura Italiana, (Brescia, 1804—1813,) tom. ix. art. xv.

of Isabella. Imagination had ample range in the boundless perspective of these unknown regions; but the results actually realized from the discoveries, during the queen's life, were comparatively insignificant. In a mere financial view, they had been a considerable charge on the crown. This was, indeed, partly owing to the humanity of Isabella, who interfered, as we have seen, to prevent the compulsory exaction of Indian labour. This was subsequently, and immediately after her death, indeed, carried to such an extent, that nearly half a million of ounces of gold were yearly drawn from the mines of Hispaniola alone.* The pearl fisheries,† and the culture of the sugar-cane, introduced from the Canaries,‡ yielded large returns under the same inhuman system.

Ferdinand, who enjoyed, by the queen's testament, half the amount of the Indian revenues, was now fully awakened to their importance. It would be unjust, however, to suppose his views limited to immediate pecuniary profits; for the measures he pursued were, in many respects, well contrived to promote the nobler ends of discovery and colonization. He invited the persons most eminent for nautical science and enterprise, as Pinzon, Solis,

* Herrera, Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. vi. cap. xviii.—According to Martyr, the two mints of Hispaniola yielded 300,000 lbs. of gold annually. De Rebus Oceanicis, dec. i. lib. x.

† The pearl fisheries of Cubagua were worth 75,000 ducats a year. Herrera, Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. vii. cap. ix.

‡ Oviedo, Historia Natural de las Indias, lib. iv. cap. viii.—Gomez, De Rebus Gestis, fol. 165.

Vespucci, to his court, where they constituted a sort of board of navigation, constructing charts, and tracing out new routes for projected voyages.* It was in his capacity of head of this department that the last-mentioned navigator had the glory, the greatest which accident and caprice ever granted to man, of giving his name to a new hemisphere.

Fleets were now fitted out on a more extended scale, which might vie, indeed, with the splendid equipments of the Portuguese, whose brilliant successes in the East excited the envy of their Castilian rivals. The king occasionally took a share in the voyage, independently of the interest which of right belonged to the crown.†

The government, however, realized less from these expensive enterprises, than individuals, many of whom, enriched by their official stations, or by accidentally falling in with some hoard of treasure among the savages, returned home to excite the envy and cupidity of their countrymen.‡ But the spirit of adventure was too high among the Castilians to require such incentive, especially when excluded from its usual field in Africa and Europe.

* Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. iii. documentos 1—13.—Herrera, Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. vii. cap. i.

† Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. iii. pp. 48. 134.

‡ Bernardin de Santa Clara, treasurer of Hispaniola, amassed, during a few years' residence there, 96,600 ounces of gold.

This same nouveau riche used to serve gold dust, says Herrera, instead of salt, at his entertainments. (Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. vii. cap. iii.) Many believed, according to the same author, that gold was so abundant as to be dragged up in nets from the beds of the rivers! Lib. x. cap. xiv.

A striking proof of the facility with which the romantic cavaliers of that day could be directed to this new career of danger on the ocean, was given at the time of the last meditated expedition into Italy under the Great Captain. A squadron of fifteen vessels, bound for the New World, was then riding in the Guadalquivir. Its complement was limited to one thousand two hundred men; but, on Ferdinand's countermanding Gonsalvo's enterprise, more than three thousand volunteers, many of them of noble family, equipped with unusual magnificence for the Italian service, hastened to Seville, and pressed to be admitted into the Indian armada.* Seville itself was in a manner depopulated by the general fever of emigration, so that it actually seemed, says a contemporary, to be tenanted only by females.†

In this universal excitement, the progress of discovery was pushed forward with a success inferior, indeed, to what might have been effected in the present state of nautical skill and science, but extraordinary for the times. The winding depths of the Gulf of Mexico were penetrated, as well as the borders of the rich but rugged isthmus which

* Ante, Part II. chapter xxiv.
—Herrera, Indias Occidentales,
dec. i. lib. x. cap. vi. vii.

† “ Per esser Sevilla nel loco che è, vi vanno tanti di loro alle Indie, che la città resta mal po-polata, e quasi in man di donne.”
(Navagiero, Viaggio, fol. 15.)

Horace said, fifteen centuries before,

“ Impiger extremos curris mercator ad Indos, Per mare pauperiem fugiens, per saxa, per ignes.”
Epist. i. 1.

connects the American continents. In 1512, Florida was discovered by a romantic old knight, Ponce de Leon, who, instead of the magical fountain of health, found his grave there.* Solis, another navigator, who had charge of an expedition projected by Ferdinand,† to reach the South Sea by the circumnavigation of the continent, ran down the coast as far as the great Rio de la Plata, where he also was cut off by the savages. In 1513, Vasco Nuñez de Balboa penetrated, with a handful of men, across the narrow part of the Isthmus of Darien, and from the summit of the Cordilleras, the first of any European, was greeted with the long-promised vision of the southern ocean.‡

The intelligence of this event excited a sensation in Spain inferior only to that caused by the discovery of America. The great object which had so long occupied the imagination of the nautical men

* Herrera, Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. ix. cap. x. — Almost all the Spanish expeditions in the New World, whether on the northern or southern continent, have a tinge of romance beyond what is found in those of other European nations. One of the most striking and least familiar of them is that of Ferdinand de Soto, the ill-fated discoverer of the Mississippi, whose bones bleach beneath its waters. His adventures are told with uncommon spirit by Mr. Bancroft, vol. i. chap. ii. of his History of the United States.

† Herrera, Indias Occidentales, dec. ii. lib. i. cap. vii.

‡ The life of this daring cavalier forms one in the elegant series of national biographies by Quintana, "Vidas de Españoles Célebres," (tom. ii. pp. 1—82,) and is familiar to the English reader in Irving's "Companions of Columbus." The third volume of Navarrete's laborious compilation is devoted to the illustration of the minor Spanish voyagers who followed up the bold track of discovery between Columbus and Cortes. Coleccion de Viages.

of Europe, and formed the purpose of Columbus's last voyage, the discovery of a communication with these far western waters, was accomplished. The famous Spice Islands, from which the Portuguese had drawn such countless sums of wealth, were scattered over this sea ; and the Castilians, after a journey of a few leagues, might launch their barks on its quiet bosom, and reach, and perhaps claim, the coveted possessions of their rivals, as falling west of the papal line of demarcation. Such were the dreams, and such the actual progress of discovery, at the close of Ferdinand's reign.

Our admiration of the dauntless heroism displayed by the early Spanish navigators in their extraordinary career is much qualified by a consideration of the cruelties with which it was tarnished ; too great to be either palliated or passed over in silence by the historian. As long as Isabella lived, the Indians found an efficient friend and protector ; but " her death," says the venerable Las Casas, " was the signal for their destruction."* Immediately on that event, the system of repartimientos, originally authorized, as we have seen, by Columbus, who seems to have had no doubt, from the first, of the crown's absolute right of property over the natives,† was carried to its full extent in the colo-

* Las Casas, Mémoire, Œuvres ; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 189.

† " Y crean (Vuestras Al-

tezas) questa isla y todas las otras son así suyas como Castilla, que aquí no falta salvo asiento y mandarles hacer lo que quinies.* Every Spaniard, however humble, had his proportion of slaves ; and men, many of them not only incapable of estimating the awful responsibility of the situation, but without the least touch of humanity in their natures, were individually intrusted with the unlimited disposal of the lives and destinies of their fellow-creatures. They abused this trust in the grossest manner, tasking the unfortunate Indian far beyond his strength, inflicting the most refined punishments on the indolent, and hunting down those who resisted or escaped, like so many beasts of chase, with ferocious bloodhounds. Every step of the white man's progress in the New World may be said to have been on the corpse of a native. Faith is staggered by the recital of the number of victims immolated in these fair regions within a very few years after the discovery ; and the heart sickens at the loathsome details of barbarities recorded by one who, if his sympathies have led him sometimes to overcolour, can never be suspected of wilfully mis-stating facts of which he was an eyewitness.† A selfish indif-sieren." Primera Carta de Colon, apud Navarrete, Coleccion de Viages, tom. i. p. 93.

* Herrera, Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. viii. cap. ix.—Las Casas, Œuvres ; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. pp. 228, 229.

† See the various Memorials of Las Casas, some of them expressly prepared for the council of the Indies. He affirms that more than 12,000,000 lives were wantonly destroyed in the New World within thirty-eight years after the discovery, and this in addition to those exterminated in the conquest of the country. (Œuvres ; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 187.) Herrera admits that Hispaniola was reduced, in less than twenty-five years, from 1,000,000 to 14,000 souls. (Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. x. cap. xii.) The nume-ference to the rights of the original occupants of the soil is a sin which lies at the door of most of the primitive European settlers, whether papist or puritan, of the New World ; but it is light in comparison with the fearful amount of crimes to be charged on the early Spanish colonists ; crimes that have, perhaps, in this world, brought down the retribution of Heaven, which has seen fit to turn this fountain of inexhaustible wealth and prosperity to the nation into the waters of bitterness.

It may seem strange that no relief was afforded by the government to these oppressed subjects : but Ferdinand, if we may credit Las Casas, was never permitted to know the extent of the injuries done to them.* He was surrounded by men in the management of the Indian department whose interest it was to keep him in ignorance.† The rical estimates of a large savage population must of course be, in a great degree, hypothetical. That it was large, however, in these fair regions may readily be inferred from the facilities of subsistence, and the temperate habits of the natives. The minimum sum in the calculation, when the number had dwindled to a few thousand, might be more easily ascertained.

* Œuvres ; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 228.

† One resident at the court, says the Bishop of Chiapa, was proprietor of 800, and another of 1100 Indians. (Œuvres ; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 238.) We learn their names from Herrera. The first was Bishop Fonseca, the latter the Comendador Conchillos, both prominent men in the Indian department. (Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. ix. cap. xiv.) The last-named person was the same individual sent by Ferdinand to his daughter in Flanders, and imprisoned there by the Archduke Philip. After that prince's death, he experienced signal favours from the Catholic king, and amassed great wealth as secretary of the Indian board. Oviedo has devoted one of his dialogues to him. Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 3, dial. 9.

remonstrances of some zealous missionaries led him,* in 1501, to refer the subject of the repartimientos to a council of jurists and theologians. This body yielded to the representations of the advocates of the system, that it was indispensable for maintaining the colonies, since the European was altogether unequal to labour in this tropical climate; and that it moreover afforded the only chance for the conversion of the Indian, who, unless compelled, could never be brought in contact with the white man.†

On these grounds, Ferdinand openly assumed the responsibility to himself and his ministers of maintaining this vicious institution; and subsequently issued an ordinance to that effect, accompanied, however, by a variety of humane and equi-

* The Dominican and other missionaries, to their credit be it told, laboured with unwearied zeal and courage for the conversion of the natives, and the vindication of their natural rights. Yet these were the men who lighted the fires of the Inquisition in their own land! To such opposite results may the same principle lead, under different circumstances!

† Las Casas concludes an elaborate memorial, prepared for the government, in 1542, on the best means of arresting the destruction of the aborigines, with two propositions. 1. That the Spaniards would still continue to settle in America, though slavery were abolished, from the superior advantages for acquiring riches it offered over the Old World. 2. That, if they would not, this would not justify slavery, since "God forbids us to do evil that good may come of it." Rare maxim from a Spanish churchman of the sixteenth century! The whole argument, which comprehends the sum of what has been since said more diffusely in defence of abolition, is singularly acute and cogent. In its abstract principles it is unanswerable, while it exposes and denounces the misconduct of his countrymen with a freedom which shows the good bishop knew no other fear than that of his Maker.

table regulations for restraining its abuse.* The license was embraced in its full extent; the regulations were openly disregarded.† Several years after, in 1515, Las Casas, moved by the spectacle of human suffering, returned to Spain, and pleaded the cause of the injured native in tones which made the dying monarch tremble on his throne. It was too late, however, for the king to execute the remedial measures he contemplated.‡ The efficient interference of Ximenes, who sent a commission for the purpose to Hispaniola, was attended with no permanent results; and the indefatigable “protector of the Indians” was left to sue for redress at the court of Charles, and to furnish a splendid, if not a solitary example there, of a bosom penetrated with the true spirit of Christian philanthropy.§

* Recop. de Leyes de las Indias, August 14th, 1509, lib. vi. tit. 8. ley 1.—Herrera, Indias Occidentales, dec. i. lib. ix. cap. xiv.

† The text expresses nearly enough the subsequent condition of things in Spanish America. “No government,” says Heeren, “has done so much for the aborigines as the Spanish.” (Modern History, Bancroft’s trans. vol. i. p. 77.) Whoever peruses its colonial codes may find much ground for the eulogium. But are not the very number and repetition of these humane provisions sufficient proof of their inefficacy?

‡ Herrera, Indias Occiden-tales, dec. ii. lib. ii. cap. iii. — Las Casas, Mémoire, Œuvres; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 239.

§ In the remarkable discussion between the Doctor Sepulveda and Las Casas, before a commission named by Charles V. in 1550, the former vindicated the persecution of the aborigines by the conduct of the Israelites towards their idolatrous neighbours; but the Spanish Fenelon replied, that “the behaviour of the Jews was no precedent for Christians; that the law of Moses was a law of rigour; but that of Jesus Christ, one of grace, mercy, peace, good-will, and charity.” (Œuvres; ed. de Llorente, tom. i. p. 374.) The

I have elsewhere examined the policy pursued by the Catholic sovereigns in the government of their colonies. The supply of precious metals yielded by them eventually, proved far greater than had ever entered into the conception of the most sanguine of the early discoverers. Their prolific soil and genial climate, moreover, afforded an infinite variety of vegetable products, which might have furnished an unlimited commerce with the mother country. Under a judicious protection, their population and productions, steadily increasing, would have enlarged, to an incalculable extent, the general resources of the empire. Such, indeed, might have been the result of a wise system of legislation.

But the true principles of colonial policy were sadly misunderstood in the sixteenth century. The discovery of a world was estimated, like that of a rich mine, by the value of its returns in gold and silver. Much of Isabella's legislation, it is true, is of that comprehensive character which shows that she looked to higher and far nobler objects. But with much that is good there was mingled, as in most of her institutions, one germ of evil, of little moment at the time indeed, but which, under the vicious culture of her successors, shot up to a height that overshadowed and blighted all the rest. This was the spirit of restriction and monopoly, aggravated by the subsequent laws of Ferdinand, and carried to an extent under the Austrian dynasty that paralyzed colonial trade.

Spaniard first persecuted the Jews, and then quoted them as an authority for persecuting all other infidels.

Under their most ingeniously perverse system of laws, the interests of both the parent country and the colonies were sacrificed. The latter, condemned to look for supplies to an incompetent source, were miserably dwarfed in their growth; while the former contrived to convert the nutriment which she extorted from the colonies into a fatal poison. The streams of wealth which flowed in from the silver quarries of Zacatecas and Potosí, were jealously locked up within the limits of the Peninsula. The great problem, proposed by the Spanish legislation of the sixteenth century, was the reduction of prices in the kingdom to the same level as in other European nations. Every law that was passed, however, tended, by its restrictive character, to augment the evil. The golden tide which, permitted a free vent, would have fertilized the region through which it poured, now buried the land under a deluge which blighted every green and living thing. Agriculture, commerce, manufactures, every branch of national industry and improvement, languished and fell to decay; and the nation, like the Phrygian monarch, who turned all that he touched to gold, cursed by the very consummation of its wishes, was poor in the midst of its treasures.

From this sad picture, let us turn to that presented by the period of our History, when, the clouds and darkness having passed away, a new morn seemed to break upon the nation. Under the firm but temperate sway of Ferdinand and Isabella, the great changes we have noticed were effected without convulsion in the state ; on the contrary, the elements of the social system, which before jarred so discordantly, were brought into harmonious action. The restless spirit of the nobles was turned from civil faction to the honourable career of public service, whether in arms or letters. The people at large, assured of the security of private rights, were occupied with the different branches of productive labour. Trade, as is abundantly shown by the legislation of the period, had not yet fallen into the discredit which attached to it in later times.* The precious metals, instead of flowing in so abundantly as to palsy the arm of industry, served only to stimulate it.†

* It is only necessary to notice the contemptuous language of Philip II.'s laws, which designate the most useful mechanic arts, as those of blacksmiths, shoemakers, leather-dressers, and the like, as "oficios viles y baxos."

A whimsical distinction prevails in Castile, in reference to the more humble occupations. A man of gentle blood may be a coachman, lacquey, scullion, or any other menial, without disparaging his nobility, which is said to sleep in the mean while ; but he fixes on it an indelible stain if he exercises any mechanical vocation. "Hence," says Capmany, "I have often seen a village in this province, in which the vagabonds, smugglers, and hangmen even, were natives, while the farrier, shoemaker, &c. was a foreigner." (Mem. de Barcelona, tom. i. part. iii. p. 40 ; tom. iii. part. ii. pp. 317, 318.) See also some sensible remarks on the subject, by Blanco White, the ingenious author of Doblado's Letters from Spain, p. 44.

† "The interval between the acquisition of money, and the rise of prices," Hume observes,

The foreign intercourse of the country was every day more widely extended. Her agents and consuls were to be found in all the principal ports of the Mediterranean and the Baltic.* The Spanish mariner, instead of creeping along the beaten track of inland navigation, now struck boldly across the great western ocean. The new discoveries had converted the land trade with India into a sea trade; and the nations of the Peninsula, who had hitherto lain remote from the great highways of commerce, now became the factors and carriers of Europe.

The flourishing condition of the nation was seen in the wealth and population of its cities, the revenues of which, augmented in all to a surprising

“is the only time when increasing gold and silver are favourable to industry.” (Essays, part ii. essay iii.) An ordinance of June 13th, 1497, complains of the scarcity of the precious metals, and their insufficiency to the demands of trade. (Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 93.) It appears, however, from Zuñiga, that the importation of gold from the New World began to have a sensible effect on the prices of commodities, from that very year. Anales de Sevilla, p. 415.

* Mr. Turner has made several extracts from the Harleian MSS. showing that the trade of Castile with England was very considerable in Isabella's time.

(History of England, vol. iv. p. 90.) A pragmatic of July 21st, 1494, for the erection of a consulate at Burgos, notices the commercial establishments in England, France, Italy, and the Low Countries. This tribunal, with other extensive privileges, was empowered to hear and determine suits between merchants; “which,” says the plain-spoken ordinance, “in the hands of lawyers are never brought to a close; porque se presentauan escritos y libelos de letrados de manera que por mal pleyto que fuesse le sostenian los letrados de manera que los hazian immortales.” (Pragmáticas del Reyno, fol. 146—148.) This institution rose soon to be of the greatest importance in Castile.

extent, had increased, in some, forty and even fifty fold beyond what they were at the commencement of the reign; * the ancient and lordly Toledo; Burgos, with its bustling, industrious traders; † Valladolid, sending forth its thirty thousand warriors from its gates, where the whole population now scarcely reaches two-thirds of that number; ‡ Cordova, in the south, and the magnificent Granada, naturalizing in Europe the arts and luxuries of the East; Saragossa, “the abundant,” as she was called from her fruitful territory; Valencia, “the beautiful;” Barcelona, rivalling in independence and maritime enterprise the proudest of the Italian republics; § Medina del Campo, whose fairs

* The sixth volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of History contains a schedule of the respective revenues afforded by the cities of Castile in the years 1477, 1482, and 1504; embracing, of course, the commencement and close of Isabella's reign. The original document exists in the archives of Simancas. We may notice the large amount and great increase of taxes in Toledo particularly, and in Seville; the former thriving from its manufactories, and the latter from the Indian trade. Seville, in 1504, furnished near a tenth of the whole revenue. Ilustracion v.

† “No ay en ella,” says Marinæo of the latter city, “gente ociosa, ni baldia, sino que todos trabajan, ansi mugeres como hombres, y los chicos como los grandes, buscando la vida con sus manos, y con sudores de sus carnes. Unos exercitan las artes mecánicas: y otros las liberales. Los que tratan las mercaderias, y hazen rica la ciudad, son muy fieles, y liberales.” (Cosas Memorables, fol. 16.) It will not be easy to meet, in prose or verse, with a finer-coloured picture of departed glory, than Mr. Slidell has given of the former city, the venerable Gothic capital, in his “Year in Spain,” chap. xii.

‡ Sandoval, Hist. del Emp. Carlos V. tom. i. p. 60.

§ It was a common saying in Navagiero's time, “Barcelona la ricca, Saragossa la harta, Valentia la hermosa.” (Viaggio, fol. 5.) The grandeur and commercial splendour of the were already the great mart for the commercial exchanges of the Peninsula ; * and Seville,† the golden gate of the Indies, whose quays began to be thronged with merchants from the most distant countries of Europe.

The resources of the inhabitants were displayed in the palaces and public edifices, fountains, aqueducts, gardens, and other works of utility and ornament. This lavish expenditure was directed by an improved taste. Architecture was studied on purer principles than before, and, with the sister arts of design, showed the influence of the new connexion first-named city, which forms the subject of Capmany's elaborate work, have been sufficiently displayed in Part I. chapter ii. of this History.

* "Algunos suponen," says Capmany, "que estas ferias eran ya famosas en tiempo de los Reyes Católicos," &c. (Mem. de Barcelona, tom. iii. p. 356.) A very cursory glance at the laws of this time will show the reasonableness of the supposition. See the Pragmáticas, fol. 146, and the ordinances from the archives of Simancas, apud Mem. de Acad. tom. vi. pp. 249. 252, providing for the erection of buildings and other accommodations for the "great resort of traders." In 1520, four years after Ferdinand's death, the city, in a petition to the regent, represented the losses sustained by its merchants in the recent fire as more than the revenues of the crown would probably be able to meet for several years. (Ibid. p. 264.) Navagiero, who visited Medina some six years later, when it was rebuilt, bears unequivocal testimony to its commercial importance. "Medina è buona terra, e piena di buone case, abbondante assai se non che le tante ferie che se vi fanno ogn' anno, e il concorso grande che vi è di tutta Spagna, fanno pur che il tutto si paga più di quel che si faria. * * * * La feria è abbondante certo di molte cose, ma sopra tutto di speciarie assai, che vengono di Portogallo ; ma le maggior faccende che se vi facciano sono cambij." Viaggio, fol. 36.

† "Quien no vió á Sevilla
No vió maravilla."

The proverb, according to Zuñiga, is as old as the time of Alonso XI. Anales de Sevilla, p. 183.

with Italy in the first gleams of that excellence which shed such lustre over the Spanish school at the close of the century.* A still more decided impulse was given to letters. More printing-presses were probably at work in Spain in the infancy of the art, than at the present day.† Ancient seminaries were remodelled; new ones were created. Barcelona, Salamanca, and Alcalá, whose cloistered solitudes are now the grave rather than the nursery of science, then swarmed with thousands of disciples, who, under the generous patronage of the government, found letters the surest path to preferment.‡ Even the lighter branches of literature

* The most eminent sculptors were, for the most part, foreigners;—as Miguel Florentin, Pedro Torregiano, Felipe de Borgoña, — chiefly from Italy, where the art was advancing rapidly to perfection in the school of Michael Angelo. The most successful architectural achievement was the cathedral of Granada, by Diego de Siloe. Pedraza, Antiguiedad de Granada, fol. 82.—Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. xvi.

† At least so says Clemencin, a competent judge. “Desde los mismos principios de su establecimiento fue mas comun la imprenta en España que lo es al cabo de trescientos años dentro ya del siglo décimonono.” Elogio de Doña Isabel, Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi.

‡ Ante, Introduction, Sect. ii. Part I. chapter xix; Part II. chapter xxi.—The Pragmátics del Reyno” comprises various ordinances, defining the privileges of Salamanca and Valladolid, the manner of conferring degrees, and of election to the chairs of the universities, so as to obviate any undue influence or corruption. (Fol. 14—21.) “Porque,” says the liberal language of the last law, “los estudios generales donde las ciencias se leen y aprenden effuerçan las leyes y fazen a los nuestros subditos y naturales sabidores y honrrados y acrecientan virtudes: y porque en el dar y assignar de las cátedras salariadas deue auer toda libertad porque sean dadas á personas sabidores y cientes.” (Taraçona, October 5th, 1495.) If one would see the totally different principles on which such elections have been conducted in modern times, let him read Doblado’s Letters from felt the revolutionary spirit of the times, and, after yielding the last fruits of the ancient system, displayed new and more beautiful varieties under the influence of Italian culture.*

With this moral developement of the nation, the public revenues, the sure index, when unforced, of public prosperity, went on augmenting with astonishing rapidity. In 1474, the year of Isabella's accession, the ordinary rents of the Castilian crown amounted to 885,000 reals;† in 1477, to 2,390,078; in 1482, after the resumption of the royal grants, to Spain, pp. 103—107. The university of Barcelona was suppressed in the beginning of the last century. Laborde has taken a brief survey of the present dilapidated condition of the others, at least as it was in 1830, since which it can scarcely have mended. Itinéraire, tom. vi. p. 144, et seq.

* See the concluding note to this chapter.

Erasmus, in a lively and elegant epistle to his friend, Francis Vergara, Greek professor at Alcalá, in 1527, lavishes unbounded panegyric on the science and literature of Spain, whose palmy state he attributes to Isabella's patronage, and the coöperation of some of her enlightened subjects. "——Hispaniæ vestræ, tanto successu, priscam eruditionis gloriam sibi postliminiò vindicanti. Quæ quum semper et regionis amœnitate fertilitatèque, semper ingeniorum eminentium ubere proventu, semper bellicâ laude flourerit, quid desiderari poterat ad summam felicitatem, nisi ut studiorum et religionis adjungeret ornamenta, quibus aspirante Deo sic paucis annis effloruit ut cæteris regionibus quamlibet hoc decorum genere præcellentibus vel invidiæ queat esse vel exemplo. * * * * *

Vos istam felicitatem secundùm Deum debetis laudatissimæ Reginarum Elisabetæ, Francisco Cardinali quondam, Alonso Fonseca nunc Archiepiscopo Tolitano, et si qui sunt horum similes, quorum autoritas tueatur, benignitas alit fovetque bonas artes." Epistolæ, p. 978.

† The sums in the text express the real de vellon; to which they have been reduced by Señor Clemencin, from the original amount in maravedis, which varied very materially in value in different years. Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Ilust. v.

12,711,591 ; and finally, in 1504, when the acquisition of Granada* and the domestic tranquillity of the kingdom had encouraged the free expansion of all its resources, to 26,283,534, or thirty times the amount received at her accession.† All this, it will be remembered, was derived from the customary established taxes, without the imposition of a single new one: indeed, the improvements in the mode of collection tended materially to lighten the burdens on the people.

The accounts of the population at this early period are, for the most part, vague and unsatisfactory. Spain, in particular, has been the subject of the most absurd, though, as it seems, not incredible estimates, sufficiently evincing the paucity of authentic data.‡ Fortunately, however, we labour under no

* The kingdom of Granada appears to have contributed rather less than one-eighth of the whole tax.

† In addition to the last-mentioned sum, the extraordinary service voted by cortes, for the dowry of the infantas, and other matters, in 1504, amounted to 16,113,014 reals de vellon; making a sum total, for that year, of 42,396,348 reals. The bulk of the crown revenues was derived from the alcavalas, and the tercias, or two-ninths of the ecclesiastical tithes. These important statements were transcribed from the books of the escribanía mayor de rentas, in the archives of Simancas. Ibid. ubi supra.

‡ The pretended amount of population has been generally in the ratio of the distance of the period taken, and of course of the difficulty of refutation. A few random remarks of ancient writers have proved the basis for the wildest hypotheses, raising the estimates to the total of what the soil, under the highest possible cultivation, would be capable of supporting. Even for so recent a period as Isabella's time, the estimate commonly received does not fall below eighteen or twenty millions. The official returns, cited in the text, of the most populous portion of the kingdom, fully expose the extravagance of preceding estimates.

such embarrassment as regards Castile in Isabella's reign. By an official report to the crown on the organization of the militia, in 1492, it appears that the population of the kingdom amounted to 1,500,000 vecinos or householders ; or, allowing four and a half to a family (a moderate estimate), to 6,750,000 souls.* This census, it will be observed, was limited to the provinces immediately composing the crown of Castile, to the exclusion of Granada, Navarre, and the Aragonese dominions.†

* These interesting particulars are obtained from a memorial, prepared by order of Ferdinand and Isabella, by their contador, Alonso de Quintanilla, on the mode of enrolling and arming the militia, in 1492 ; as a preliminary step to which, he procured a census of the actual population of the kingdom. It is preserved in a volume entitled Relaciones tocantes á la junta de la Hermandad, in that rich national repository, the archives of Simancas. See a copious extract, apud Mem. de la Acad. de Hist. tom. vi. Apend. xii.

† I am acquainted with no sufficient and authentic data for computing the population, at this time, of the crown of Aragon, always greatly below that of the sister kingdom. I find as little to be relied on, notwithstanding the numerous estimates, in one form or another, vouchsafed by historians and travellers, of the population of Granada. Marinæo enumerates fourteen cities and ninety-seven towns, (omitting, as he says, many places of less note,) at the time of the conquest ; a statement obviously too vague for statistical purposes. (Cosas Memorables, fol. 179.) The capital, swelled by the influx from the country, contained, according to him, 200,000 souls at the same period. (Fol. 177.) In 1506, at the time of the forced conversions, we find the numbers in the city dwindled to fifty, or at most, seventy thousand. (Comp. Bleda, Crónica, lib. v. cap. xxiii. and Bernaldez, Reyes Católicos, MS. cap. clix.) Loose as these estimates necessarily are, we have no better to guide us in calculating the total amount of the population of the Moorish kingdom, or of the losses sustained by the copious emigrations during the first fifteen years after the conquest ; although there has been no lack of confident assertion, as to both, in later writers. The desideratum, in regard to Granada, will now probably not be supplied ; the pub-

It was taken, moreover, before the nation had time to recruit from the long and exhausting struggle of the Moorish war, and twenty-five years before the close of the reign, when the population, under circumstances peculiarly favourable, must have swelled to a much larger amount. Thus circumscribed, however, it was probably considerably in advance of that of England at the same period.* How have the destinies of the two countries since been reversed !

The territorial limits of the monarchy, in the mean time, went on expanding beyond example ; —Castile and Leon, indissolubly united with the crown of Aragon and its foreign dependencies, Sicily and Sardinia, with the kingdoms of Granada, Navarre, and Naples, with the Canaries, Oran, and the other settlements in Africa, and with the islands and vast continents of America. To these broad domains the comprehensive schemes of the sovereigns would have added Portugal ; and their arrangements for this, although defeated for the lic offices in the kingdom of Aragon, if searched with the same industry as those in Castile, would doubtless afford the means for correcting the crude estimates so current respecting that country.

* Hallam, in his "Constitutional History of England," estimates the population of the realm, in 1485, at 3,000,000. (Vol. i. p. 10.) The discrepancies, however, of the best historians on this subject, prove the difficulty of arriving at even a probable result. Hume, on the authority of Sir Edward Coke, puts the population of England, (including people of all sorts,) a century later, in 1588, at only 900,000. The historian cites Lodovico Guicciardini, however, for another estimate, as high as 2,000,000, for the same reign of Queen Elizabeth. History of England, vol. vi. Append. iii.

present, opened the way to its eventual completion under Philip the Second.*

The petty states which had before swarmed over the Peninsula, neutralizing each other's operations, and preventing any effective movement abroad, were now amalgamated into one whole. Sectional jealousies and antipathies, indeed, were too sturdily rooted to be at once extinguished ; but they gradually subsided under the influence of a common government and community of interests. A more enlarged sentiment was infused into the people, who, in their foreign relations, at least, assumed the attitude of one great nation. The names of Castilian and Aragonese were merged in the comprehensive one of Spaniard ; and Spain, with an empire which stretched over three quarters of the globe, and which almost realized the proud boast that the sun never set within her borders, now rose, not to the first class only, but to the first place, in the scale of European powers.

The extraordinary circumstances of the country tended naturally to nourish the lofty, romantic qualities, and the somewhat exaggerated tone of sentiment, which always pervaded the national character. The age of chivalry had not faded away in Spain, as in most other lands.† It was fostered in time

* Philip II. claimed the Portuguese crown in right of his mother and his wife, both descended from Maria, third daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, who, as the reader may remember, married King Emanuel.

† Old Caxton mourns over the little honour paid to the

of peace by the tourneys, jousts, and other warlike pageants, which graced the court of Isabella.* It gleamed out, as we have seen, in the Italian campaigns under Gonsalvo de Cordova, and shone forth in all its splendours in the war of Granada. "This was a right gentle war," says Navagiero, in a passage too pertinent to be omitted, "in which, as fire-arms were comparatively little used, each knight had the opportunity of showing his personal prowess; and rare was it that a day passed without some feat of arms and valorous exploit. The nobility and chivalry of the land all thronged there to gather renown. Queen Isabel, who attended with her whole court, breathed courage into every heart. There was scarce a cavalier who was not enamoured of some one or other of her ladies, the witness of his achievements, and who, as she usages of chivalry in his time; and it is sufficient evidence of its decay in England, that Richard III. thought it necessary to issue an ordinance, requiring those possessed of the requisite 40*l.* a year to receive knighthood. (Turner, History of England, vol. iii. pp. 391, 392.) The use of artillery was fatal to chivalry; a consequence well understood even at the early period of our History; at least, so we may infer from the verses of Ariosto, where Orlando throws Cimosco's gun into the sea.

"Lo tolse e disse: Acciò
più non istea

Mai cavalier per te d'essere
ardito;

Nè quanto il buono val,
mai più si vanti

Il rio per te valer, quì giù rimanti."

Orlando Furioso, canto 9, stanza 90.

* "Quien podrá contar," exclaims the old Curate of Los Palacios, "la grandeza, el concierto de su corte, la cavallería de los Nobles de toda España, Duques, Maestres, Marqueses é Ricos homes; los Galanes, las Damas, las Fiestas, los Torneos, la Moltitud de Poetas é trovadores," &c. Reyes Católicos, MS. cap. cci.

presented him his weapons, or some token of her favour, admonished him to bear himself like a true knight, and show the strength of his passion by his valiant deeds.* What knight so craven, then," exclaims the chivalrous Venetian, "that he would not have been more than a match for the stoutest adversary; or who would not sooner have lost his life a thousand times, than return dishonoured to the lady of his love! In truth," he concludes, "this conquest may be said to have been achieved by love rather than by arms."†

* Oviedo notices the existence of a lady-love, even with cavaliers who had passed their prime, as a thing of quite as imperative necessity in his day, as it was afterwards regarded by the gallant knight of La Mancha. "Costumbre es en España entre los señores de estado que venidos á la corte, aunque nó estén enamorados ó que pasen de la mitad de la edad fingir que aman por servir y favorecer á alguna dama, y gastar como quien son en fiestas y otras cosas que se ofrescen de tales pasatiempos y amores, sin que les dé pena Cupido." Quincuagenas, MS. Bat. 1, quinc. 1, dial. 28.

† Viaggio, fol. 27, 1563.

Andrea Navagiero, whose itinerary has been of such frequent reference in these pages, was a noble Venetian, born in 1483. He became very early distinguished, in his cultivated capital, for his scholarship, poetical talents, and eloquence, of which he has left specimens, especially in Latin verse, in the highest repute to this day with his countrymen. He was not, however, exclusively devoted to letters, but was employed in several foreign missions by the republic. It was on his visit to Spain, as minister to Charles V. soon after that monarch's accession, that he wrote his Travels; and he filled the same office at the court of Francis I. when he died, at the premature age of forty-six, in 1529. (Tiraboschi, Letteratura Italiana, tom. vii. part. iii. p. 228; ed. 1785.) His death was universally lamented by the good and the learned of his time, and is commemorated by his friend, Cardinal Bembo, in two sonnets, breathing all the sensibility of that tender and elegant poet. (Rime, Son. 109, 110.) Navagiero becomes connected with Castilian literature by the circumstance of Boscan's referring to his suggestion the innovation he so successfully made in the forms of the national verse. Obras, fol. 20; ed. 1543.

The Spaniard was a knight-errant in its literal sense,* roving over seas on which no bark had ever ventured, among islands and continents where no civilized man had ever trodden, and which fancy peopled with all the marvels and drear enchantments of romance; courting danger in every form, combating everywhere, and everywhere victorious. The very odds presented by the defenceless natives among whom he was cast, "a thousand of whom," to quote the words of Columbus, "were not equal to three Spaniards," was in itself typical of his profession;† and the brilliant destinies to which the meanest adventurer was often called, now carving out with his good sword some "El Dorado" more splendid than fancy had dreamed of, and now overturning some old barbaric dynasty, were full as extraordinary as the wildest chimeras which Ariosto ever sang, or Cervantes satirized.

His countrymen who remained at home, feeding

* Fernando de Pulgar, after enumerating various cavaliers of his acquaintance, who had journeyed to distant climes in quest of adventures and honourable feats of arms, continues, "E oi decir de otros Castellanos que con ánimo de Caballeros fueron por los Reynos estraños á facer armas con qualquier Caballero que quisiere facerlas con ellos, é por ellas ganaron honra para sí é fama de valientes y esforzados Caballeros para los Fijosdalgos de Castilla." Claros Varones, tit. 17.

† "Son todos," says the Admiral, "de ningun ingenio en las armas, y muy cobardes, que mil no agudarian tres!" (Primer Viage de Colon.) What could the bard of chivalry say more?

"Ma quel ch'al timor non diede albergo, Estima la vil turba e l'arme tante
Quel che dentro alla mandra all'aer cupo, Il numer dell'agnelle estimi il lupo."
Orlando Furioso, canto 12.

greedily on the reports of his adventures, lived almost equally in an atmosphere of romance. A spirit of chivalrous enthusiasm penetrated the very depths of the nation, swelling the humblest individual with lofty aspirations and a proud consciousness of the dignity of his nature. "The princely disposition of the Spaniards," says a foreigner of the time, "delighteth me much, as well as the gentle nurture and noble conversation, not merely of those of high degree, but of the citizen, peasant, and common labourer."* What wonder that such sentiments should be found incompatible with sober, methodical habits of business, or that the nation indulging them should be seduced from the humble paths of domestic industry to a brilliant and bolder career of adventure. Such consequences became too apparent in the following reign.†

In noticing the circumstances that conspired to form the national character, it would be unpardonable to omit the establishment of the Inquisition, which contributed so largely to counterbalance the benefits resulting from Isabella's government; an

* L. Marinæo, Cosas Memorables, fol. 30.

† "I Spagnoli," says the Venetian minister, "non solo in questo paese di Granata, ma in tutto 'l resto della Spagna medesimamente, non sono molto industriosi, ne piantano, ne lavorano volontieri la terra; ma se danno ad altro, e più volontieri vanno alla guerra, o alle Indie ad acquistarsi facultà, che per tal vie." (Viaggio, fol. 25.) Testimonies to the same purport thicken as the stream of history descends. See several collected by Capmany (Mem. de Barcelona, tom. iii. pp. 358 et seq.), who certainly cannot be charged with ministering to the vanity of his countrymen.

institution which has done more than any other to stay the proud march of human reason ; which, by imposing uniformity of creed, has proved the fruitful parent of hypocrisy and superstition ; which has soured the sweet charities of human life,* and, settling like a foul mist on the goodly promise of the land, closed up the fair buds of science and civilization ere they were fully opened. . Alas ! that such a blight should have fallen on so gallant and generous a people ! That it should have been brought on it too by one of such unblemished patriotism and purity of motive as Isabella ! How must her virtuous spirit, if it be permitted the departed good to look down on the scene of their earthly labours, mourn over the misery and moral degradation entailed on her country by this one act ! So true is it, that the measures of this great queen have had a permanent influence, whether for good or for evil, on the destinies of her country.

* One may trace its immediate influence in the writings of a man like the Curate of Los Palacios, naturally, as it would seem, of an amiable, humane disposition ; but who complacently remarks, “ They (Ferdinand and Isabella) lighted up the fires for the heretics, in which, with good reason, they have burnt, and shall continue to burn, so long as a soul of them remains !” (Reyes Católicos, MS. cap. vii.) It becomes more perceptible in the literature of later times, and, what is singular, most of all in the lighter departments of poetry and fiction, which seem naturally devoted to purposes of pleasure. No one can estimate the full influence of the Inquisition in perverting moral sense, and infusing the deadly venom of misanthropy into the heart, who has not perused the works of the great Castilian poets, of Lope de Vega, Ercilla, above all Calderon, whose lips seem to have been touched with fire from the very altars of this accursed tribunal.

The immediate injury inflicted on the nation by the spirit of bigotry in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, although greatly exaggerated,* was doubtless serious enough. Under the otherwise beneficent operation of their government, however, the healthful and expansive energies of the state were sufficient to heal up these and deeper wounds, and still carry it onward in the career of prosperity.

* The late secretary of the Inquisition has made an elaborate computation of the number of its victims. According to him, 18,000 were publicly burned by the several tribunals of Castile and Aragon, and 191,413 suffered other punishments, between 1481, the date of the commencement of the modern institution, and 1518. (Hist. de l'Inquisition, tom. iv. chap. xlv.) Llorente appears to have come to these appalling results by a very plausible process of calculation, and without any design to exaggerate; nevertheless, his data are exceedingly imperfect, and he has himself, on a revision, considerably reduced, in his fourth volume, the original estimates in the first. I find good grounds for reducing them still further. 1. He quotes Mariana for the fact that 2000 suffered martyrdom at Seville, in 1481, and makes this the basis of his calculations for the other tribunals of the kingdom. Marinæo, a contemporary, on the other hand, states, that "in the course of a few years they burned nearly 2000 heretics;" thus not only diffusing this amount over a greater period of time, but embracing all the tribunals then existing in the country. (Cosas Memorables, fol. 164.) 2. Bernaldez states, that five-sixths of the Jews resided in the kingdom of Castile. (Reyes Católicos, MS. cap. cx.) Llorente, however, has assigned an equal amount of victims to each of the five tribunals of Aragon, with those of the sister kingdom, excepting only Seville.

One might reasonably distrust Llorente's tables, from the facility with which he receives the most improbable estimates in other matters, as, for example, the number of banished Jews, which he puts at 800,000. (Hist. de l'Inquisition, tom. i. p. 261.) I have shown, from contemporary sources, that this number did not probably exceed 160,000, or, at most, 170,000. (Part I. chapter xvii.) Indeed, the cautious Zurita, borrowing probably from the same authorities, cites the latter number. (Anales, tom. v. fol. 9.) Mariana, who owes so much of his narrative to the Aragonese historian, convert-

With this impulse, indeed, the nation continued to advance higher and higher, in spite of the system of almost unmingled evil pursued in the following reigns. The glories of this later period, of the age of Charles the Fifth, as it is called, must find their true source in the measures of his illustrious predecessors. It was in their court that Boscan, Garcilasso, Mendoza, and the other master-spirits were trained, who moulded Castilian literature into the new and more classical forms of later times.*

ing, as it would appear, these 170,000 individuals into families, states the whole, in round numbers, at 800,000 souls. (Hist. de España, tom. ii. lib. xxvi. cap. i.) Llorente, not content with this, swells the amount still further, by that of the Moorish exiles, and by emigrants to the New World, (on what authority?) to 2,000,000; and, going on with the process, computes that this loss may fairly infer one of 8,000,000 inhabitants to Spain at the present day! (Ibid. ubi supra.) Thus the mischief imputed to the Catholic sovereigns goes on increasing in a sort of arithmetical progression, with the duration of the monarchy.

Nothing is so striking to the imagination as numerical estimates; they speak a volume in themselves, saving a world of periphrasis and argument; nothing is so difficult to form with exactness, or even probability, when they relate to an early period; and nothing more carelessly received, and confidently circulated. The enormous statements of the Jewish exiles, and the baseless ones of the Moorish, are not peculiar to Llorente, but have been repeated, without the slightest qualification or distrust, by most modern historians and travellers.

* In the two closing chapters of Part I. of this History, I have noticed the progress of letters in this reign; the last which displayed the antique colouring and truly national characteristics of Castilian poetry. There were many circumstances which operated, at this period, to work an important revolution, and subject the poetry of the Peninsula to a foreign influence. The Italian Muse, after her long silence, since the age of the trecentisti, had again revived, and poured forth such ravishing strains as made themselves heard and felt in every corner of Europe. Spain, in particular, was open to their influence. Her language had an intimate

It was under Gonsalvo de Cordova, that Leyva, Pescara, and the other great captains with their invincible legions were formed, who enabled Charles the Fifth to dictate laws to Europe for half a century : and it was Columbus, who not only led the way, but animated the Spanish navigator with the spirit of discovery. Scarcely was Ferdinand's reign brought to a close, before Magellan completed what that monarch had projected, the circumnavigation of the southern continent ; the victorious banners of Cortes had already penetrated into the golden realms affinity with the Italian. The improved taste and culture of the period led to a diligent study of foreign models. Many Spaniards, as we have seen, went abroad to perfect themselves in the schools of Italy, while Italian teachers filled some of the principal chairs in the Spanish universities. Lastly, the acquisition of Naples, the land of Sannazaro and of a host of kindred spirits, opened an obvious communication with the literature of that country. With the nation thus prepared, it was not difficult for a genius like that of Boscan, supported by the tender and polished Garcilasso, and by Mendoza, whose stern spirit found relief in images of pastoral tranquillity and ease, to recommend the more finished forms of Italian versification to their countrymen. These poets were all born in Isabella's reign. The first of them, the principal means of effecting this literary revolution, singularly enough, was a Catalan, whose compositions in the Castilian prove the ascendancy which this dialect had already obtained as the language of literature. The second, Garcilasso de la Vega, was the son of the distinguished statesman and diplomatist of that name, so often noticed in our History ; and Mendoza was a younger son of the amiable Count of Tendilla, the governor of Granada, whom he resembled in nothing but his genius. Both the elder Garcilasso and Tendilla had represented their sovereigns at the papal court, where they doubtless became tinctured with that relish for the Italian which produced such results in the education of their children.

The new revolution penetrated far below the superficial forms of versification ; and the Castilian poet relinquished, with his redondillas and artless asonantes, the homely but heartful themes of the olden time ; or, if he dwelt on them, it was of Montezuma ; and Pizarro, a very few years later, following up the lead of Balboa, embarked on the enterprise which ended in the downfall of the splendid dynasty of the Incas.

Thus it is, that the seed sown under a good system continues to yield fruit in a bad one. The season of the most brilliant results, however, is not always that of the greatest national prosperity. The splendours of foreign conquest in the boasted reign of Charles the Fifth were dearly purchased by the decline of industry at home, and the loss of

with an air of studied elegance and precision, very remote from the Doric simplicity and freshness of the romantic minstrelsy. If he aspired to some bolder theme, it was rarely suggested by the stirring and patriotic recollections of his nation's history. Thus, nature and the rude graces of a primitive age gave way to superior refinement and lettered elegance ; many popular blemishes were softened down, a purer and nobler standard was attained, but the national characteristics were effaced ; beauty was everywhere, but it was the beauty of art, not of nature. The change itself was perfectly natural. It corresponded with the external circumstances of the nation, and its transition from an insulated position to a component part of the great European commonwealth, which subjected it to other influences and principles of taste, and obliterated, to a certain extent, the peculiar features of the national physiognomy.

How far the poetic literature of Castile was benefited by the change, has been matter of long and hot debate between the critics of the country, in which I shall not involve the reader. The revolution, however, was the growth of circumstances, and was immediately effected by individuals belonging to the age of Ferdinand and Isabella. As such, I had originally proposed to devote a separate chapter to its illustration ; but I have been deterred from it by the unexpected length to which the work has already extended, as well as by the consideration, on a nearer view, that these results, though prepared under a preceding reign, properly fall under the domestic history of Charles V : a history which still remains to be written. But who will attempt a pendant to the delineations of Robertson ?

liberty. The patriot will see little to cheer him in this "golden age" of the national history, whose outward show of glory will seem to his penetrating eye only the hectic brilliancy of decay. He will turn to an earlier period, when the nation, emerging from the sloth and license of a barbarous age, seemed to renew its ancient energies, and to prepare like a giant to run its course; and glancing over the long interval since elapsed, during the first half of which the nation wasted itself on schemes of mad ambition, and in the latter has sunk into a state of paralytic torpor, he will fix his eye on the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, as the most glorious epoch in the annals of his country.

INDEX.

A.

- ABBOT, ABIEL, his letters from Cuba, iii. 313. n.
- Abdallah, or Boabdil, son of Muley Abul Hacen, proclaimed Sultan of Granada, ii. 12; marches against the Christians, 37; defeated and captured, 42; debates in the Spanish council respecting, 44; treaty with, 45; his interview with Ferdinand, 46; seeks the protection of the Castilian sovereigns, 72; cuts to pieces a body of El Zagal's cavalry, and receives privileges from Ferdinand and Isabella, 102; inactive in Granada, 137; summoned to surrender Granada, 161; capitulates, 175; his life endangered, 176; his meeting with Ferdinand, 178; takes a last view of Granada, 180; his fate, 181; Irving's remarks on him, 181, n.
- Abdallah, or "The Valiant," brother of Hacen, his bravery in the rout of the Axarquía, ii. 25; his advancement to the throne, 71; defeated before Velez Malaga, 91; draws the Duke of Cadiz into an ambuscade, 124; makes forays into the Christian territories, 125; extent of his domain, 128; kept in check at Guadix, 137; treaty of surrender with, 149; his interview with Ferdinand, 150; occupation of his domain, 151; equivalent assigned to, ib.; remarks respecting him, 152.
- Adalid, meaning of, ii. 23, n.
- Adelantado, title and office of, ii. 23, n.
- Adrian of Utrecht, preceptor of Charles V. and envoy to Ferdinand, iii. 463; opposes Ximenes, 486.
- Adventure, spirit of, in the time of Ferdinand and Isabella, iii. 560.
- Africa, Oran in, captured, iii. 381; Navarro's conquests in, 387.
- Agnadel, battle of, iii. 409.
- Agriculture, in Spain, i. 398; in Granada, 407; during the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, iii. 549.
- Aguilar, Alonzo d', his connexion with the expedition to Axarquía, ii. 22, 24; brother of Gonsalvo de Cordova, 396; leader of the expedition against Sierra Vermeja, 537; his gallantry and death, 541; his noble character, 543; his income, iii. 520, n.
- Albaycin, revolt of the, ii. 520; insurgents appeased by Talavera, 521.
- Albigenses, their sufferings from the Inquisition, i. 347.
- Albion, Juan de, sent on a mission to Charles VIII. ii. 379.
- Albornoz, sent on a mission to Rome; treatment of, by Ximenes, ii. 492.
- Albret, Jean d', his marriage with Catharine of Navarre, ii. 81, iii. 425; abandons his capital, 430; takes refuge in France, 431; his character, 432; accompanies Longueville, 434; further remarks respecting, ib. n.; unjust treatment of, 444.
- Alcalá de Henares, literary character of, ii. 292; Ximenes returns to, from Africa, with valuable Arabian manuscripts, iii. 386.
- Alcalá, University of, iii. 390; its magnificence, 391; provisions for education in, 392; professorships in, 394, n.; number of students, 395; visited by Ferdinand, ib.; bequest to, by Ximenes, 402; its reputation, ib.; Ximenes buried there, 500.
- Alcantara, military order of, i. 326, 328.
- Alcavala, commutation of the capricious tax of, iii. 524; remarks on it, ib. n.
- Alexander VI. Pope, Ferdinand and Isabella's application to, ii. 260; his character, ib. 354; famous bulls of, 261, 270; takes refuge in the Castle of St. Angelo, 371; his solicitations, and grants to Spain, 377; confers the title of Catholic on the Spanish sovereigns, ib.; aided by Gonsalvo, at Ostia, 430; his reception of Gonsalvo, 431; empowers Ferdinand and Isabella to receive all the tithes in the colonial dominions, iii. 39; aids Louis XII. 59; remonstrance to by, the Spanish sovereigns, 62; confirms the partition of Naples, 75; his purposes in regard to France, 174, 178; his death, 177; treatment of his remains, ib. n.; the election of his successor, 180.

- Alfonso, a physician, employed in the compilation of the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399.
- Alhakem II, his encouragement of literature, i. 400.
- Alhama, description of, i. 438; Spanish expedition against, 441; its fall, 446; besieged by the Moors, 449; distress of the garrison there, 451; siege raised, 455; again besieged, and abandoned, 456; entered by Ferdinand, 457; Isabella, the cause of not abandoning it, iii. 263.
- Alhambra, The, of Granada, i. 405; taken possession of, ii. 177. 179; cross raised on, 178; Isabella buried there, iii. 249; Ferdinand's burial-place, 469.
- Allègre, Ives d', throws himself into Gaeta, iii. 138. 181; secretly supports a faction, 196; despatched to hold the enemy in check, 203, 204; banished, 214; his recall and death, 215. 222. 416.
- Almeria, painful march of the Spanish army to, ii. 149; occupation of, 150; Ferdinand's policy in regard to, 164.
- Almeyda, Edward de, his desperate heroism at the battle of Toro, i. 273.
- Alonso, heir of the Portuguese monarchy, his union with the Infanta Isabella, i. 284, ii. 159. 443; public festivities thereupon, 160; his death, 444.
- Alphonso X. of Castile, his code, i. 42.
- Alphonso, of Castile, brother of Henry IV, demand by the nobles that he shall be publicly acknowledged as Henry's successor, i. 182; crowned after the deposition of Henry IV. 184; at the battle of Olmedo, 194; his death and character, 197.
- Alphonso V. of Aragon, succeeds Ferdinand I, i. 135; the government of his kingdom devolves on his brother John, ib.; his death, 140.
- Alphonso V. king of Portugal, his proposal of marriage rejected by Isabella, i. 207; supports the cause of Joanna, 257; his invasion of Castile, 259; measures for a union of, with Joanna, ib. 283; challenged by Ferdinand to a personal combat, 262; his position before Zamora, 268; suddenly decamps, 270; overtaken by Ferdinand, ib.; his escape, 274; visits France, 277; his disappointment as to succour, 278; returns to Portugal, 280; Prince John is crowned, but resigns in favour of, ib.; his death, 286.
- Alphonso II. king of Naples, flies to Sicily, and abdicates the crown in favour of Ferdinand II, ii. 381, 382.
- Alps, crossed by Charles VIII. king of France, ii. 370; by Louis XII, iii. 408.
- Alpuxarras, rising of the Moors in the, ii. 530; new insurrection there, 535.
- Alva, Duke of, commander of the expedition against Guienne, iii. 427; invades Navarre, 429; his retreat, 433; opposes Ximenes, 494.
- Alvaro, son of the Duke of Braganza, assassinated, ii. 104.
- Alviano, Bartolomeo d', the head of the Orsini, enlists under Gonsalvo, iii. 200; urges him to attack the French, 201; builds a bridge, and crosses the Garigliano, 202, 203; his bravery near Vicenza, 422; his death and burial, ib. n.
- Amadis de Gaula, remarks on the, ii. 301.
- Amboise, Cardinal d', his pretensions to the papal chair, iii. 178; unsuccessful, 179.
- Ammunition, the kinds of, ii. 52.
- Amposta, reduction of, i. 158.
- Ancient Inquisition, origin and history of the, i. 343; see Modern Inquisition.
- Andalusia, the theatre of savage warfare between the Guzmans and Ponces de Leon, i. 226. 298; royal progress through, 302; Don Pedro Henriquez, adelantado of, ii. 22; loss of, at the rout in Axarquía, 34.
- Andrada, iii. 187; the rearguard left under, 203. 207; joins Gonsalvo, ib.
- Angevin lords, Gonsalvo's treatment of the, iii. 212, n.; restoration of the, by Ferdinand, 337.
- Arabs, see Moors.
- Aragon, Alonso de, natural son of Ferdinand, iii. 479, n.
- Aragon, Juan de, proposition for the union of, with Elvira, iii. 366.
- Aragon, state of, in the middle of the fifteenth century, i. 2; its gradual expansion, 3; its union with Catalonia, 59; with Valencia, ib.; attention given to the navy of, 60; its extensive conquests, 61; origin of the government of, 62; barons of, 64; measures for reducing the authority of the nobles of, 67, 70; Alphonso III. approves the privileges of union, 68; anarchy in, 69; defeat of the army of the union in, ib.; full possession of constitutional liberty in, 70; the cortes of, and its various branches, 71; its mode of conducting business, 74; fidelity of the officers of government in, 77; the General Privileges, ib.; influence of the free institutions of, manifested by writers there, 100, n.; condition of, during the minority of Ferdinand, 134; reign of John II, 135; treaty of, with France,

- 156 ; termination of the civil war in, 168 ; union of, with Castile, by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella, 209. 287 ; troubles there, 224 ; treaty between, and France, 231 ; introduction of the Ancient Inquisition into, 343 ; opposition there, to the introduction of the Inquisition by Ferdinand, 379 ; liberation of Catalan serfs in, ii. 82 ; further particulars respecting the Inquisition in, 83 ; remonstrance of the Cortes, 84 ; conspiracy, 85 ; assassination of Arbues, ib. ; cruel persecutions there, 86 ; visited by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1487, 123 ; the Hermanidad adopted there, ib. ; its extensive commerce in the middle ages, 195, n. ; treatment of the Jews in, 227 ; visited by the sovereigns in 1492, 241 ; difficulties in, respecting female succession to the crown, 461 ; Ferdinand's conduct in regard to the Inquisition in, iii. 474, n. ; his treatment of the nobles in, 520 ; population of, 577, n. ; victims of the Inquisition in, 585, n.
- Arbues, Pedro, inquisitor in Saragossa, ii. 84 ; assassinated, 85 ; honoured as a martyr, 87.
- Architecture in Spain, iii. 573, 574, n.
- Aristotle, reverence for, among the Spanish Arabs, i. 420 ; Ximenes' projects an edition of, iii. 400, n.
- Army, Castilian, discipline of the, at Malaga, ii. 106 ; numbers of the, in 1488, 124 ; houses erected for it near Baza, 140 ; strict discipline of the, 141 ; their painful march from Baza, 149.
- Arrows, poisoned by the Moors, ii. 53.
- Ars, Louis d', his gallantry, iii. 221.
- Artillery, early knowledge of, in Spain, i. 154, n. ; remarks respecting the, ii. 50 ; difficulty of transporting it, 52 ; comparison of the French and the Italian, 375.
- Astrolabe, invention of the, ii. 194 ; application of the, to navigation, 195, n.
- Atar, Ali, the defender of Loja, i. 38 ; killed at the battle of Lucena, 40.
- Atella, Montpensier besieged in, ii. 414.
- Aubigny, M. d', commander of the forces in Calabria, ii. 395 ; his defeat, 407 ; commander of the land forces sent against Naples, iii. 75 ; superseded, 96 ; despatched to the Calabrias, 101 ; defeats a small force near Terranova, 108 ; is defeated near Seminara, 139, 224, n. ; visited by Ferdinand, 354.
- Austria, alliances with the house of, ii. 447 ; see Maximilian.
- Autos da fe, account of, i. 375.
- Averroes, his commentary on Aristotle, i. 420.
- Axarquia, expedition to, ii. 22.
- B.
- Bacon, Lord, cited respecting the fall of Granada, ii. 182, n.
- Baena, Alphonso de, i. 125.
- Balboa, Vasco Nunez de, crosses the isthmus of Darien, iii. 472.
- Ballads or romances, historical value of, i. 411, n. ; early cultivation of, in Spain, ii. 305 ; their resemblance to the English, 307 ; numerous editions of them, 314.
- Bancroft, George, remarks on his history, iii. 44, n.
- Bank, the first in Europe, established at Barcelona, i. 91.
- Barbosa Arias, an eminent scholar, notice of, ii. 288.
- Barcelona, its early civilisation and institutions, i. 59 ; its early commercial prosperity, 89 ; first bank of exchange and deposit established at, 91 ; her municipal institutions, and various objects of interest, 92 ; independent conduct of, towards Ferdinand I, 95 ; the consistory of, established, 99 ; its influence, 100 ; university of, founded, ib. ; besieged by John, and surrendered, 166. 228 ; rejoicings at, upon the recovery of Ferdinand, ii. 245 ; the court at, 246 ; reception of Columbus there, 247 ; the treaty of, between the Spanish sovereigns and Charles VIII, 363 ; its importance to Spain, 364 ; suppression of the university of, iii. 575, n.
- Barleta, Gonsalvo retires to, iii. 99 ; distress of the Spaniards at, 106 ; constancy of the Spaniards there, 108 ; arrival of supplies, 111 ; Gonsalvo prepares to leave, 117. 129.
- Barons of Aragon, i. 64 ; their small number, ib. ; their great power, 65 ; privileges of union, 68 ; reduced by Peter IV, 69.
- Battles, remarks on the mode of conducting, in Italy, ii. 371.
- Bayard, Pierre de, iii. 97 ; at the siege of Barleta, 100 ; at a tournament, 103 ; duel between him and Sotomayor, 104 ; heroism of, 198 ; his ardour at the bridge of Mola, 206.
- Baza, reconnoitred by Ferdinand, ii. 124 ; preparations for the siege of, 128 ; the king takes command of the army there, 129 ; position and strength of, 131 ; assault on the garden before, ib. ; despondency of the Spanish chiefs before, 133 ; the queen raises the spirits of her

- troops, 135 ; gardens there cleared of their timber, 136 ; closely invested, 137 ; despatches sent thither from the Sultan of Egypt, 138 ; houses erected there for the army, 139 ; effects of a heavy tempest, 141 ; resolution of the besieged in, 144 ; Isabella visits the camp before, 145 ; suspension of arms, ib. ; its surrender, 146 ; the conditions, 147 ; occupation of, 148 ; treaty of surrender with El Zagal, 149 ; Ferdinand's policy in regard to, 150.
- Beatrice, Dona, of Portugal, her exertions to bring about a peace with Castile, i. 282.
- Beltraneja ; see Joanna Beltraneja.
- Benegas, Reduan, ii. 26. 34.
- Benemaquez, fate of the town of, ii. 55.
- Bernaldez, Andres, curate of Los Palacios, notice of, and of his writings, ii. 190, n.
- Bible, Ximenes's edition of the, ii. 290, n. 292. iii. 386 ; account of it, 397.
- Bigotry of Isabella, i. 360, ii. 239 ; respecting the heathen, iii. 17 ; common to the age of Isabella, 257 ; and to later times, 258.
- Blancas, Jerome, notice of, and of his writings, i. 102.
- Blanche, daughter of John II. of Aragon, i. 135 ; title to the crown of Navarre left to, 148 ; her tragical story, 150 ; her death, 152 ; her repudiation by Henry IV, 172.
- Boabdil ; see Abdallah.
- Board of Indian affairs established, ii. 255, iii. 38.
- Bobadilla, Francisco de, sent out to Hispaniola with extraordinary powers, iii. 18. 24 ; his treatment of Columbus, 19 ; remarks respecting his appointment, and his extraordinary powers, 22 ; Ovando is ordered to send him home for trial, 25 ; his fate, 31.
- Bobadilla, Dona Beatriz Fernandez de, the intimate friend of Isabella, i. 191, n. ; the wife of Andres de Cabrera, 235 ; mentioned in Isabella's testament, iii. 244 ; present at her death, 266, n. ; expelled from Segovia, 319 ; re-establishes herself at Segovia, 344, n.
- Bologna, taken possession of by the French, iii. 410 ; relieved by the Duke de Nemours, 414.
- Books, Isabella's collection of, ii. 274 ; remarks on collections of, before the introduction of printing, ib. n. ; destroyed by Ximenes, 516.
- Borgia, Cæsar, proposition to transfer, from a sacred to a secular dignity, iii. 62 ; his conduct at Capua, 78 ; Gonzalvo's treatment of, 460.
- Bourbon, Gilbert de ; see Montpensier.
- Boyl, Bernaldo, sent to negotiate a treaty with France, iii. 125, 126.
- Braganza, Duke of, anecdote respecting, 280, n.
- Brazil discovered, and taken possession of, iii. 54.
- Brescia captured by the French, iii. 414.
- Bullights, Isabella's views of, iii. 266, n.
- C.
- Cabra, Count of, ii. 42 ; honours conferred on him, 59.
- Cabrera, Andres de, the husband of Beatriz de Bobadilla, his exertions to reconcile Henry IV. and Isabella, i. 235 ; his co-operation in favour of proclaiming Isabella as queen, 251, n. ; Marquis of Moya, tumults at Segovia respecting, 295 ; expelled from Segovia, iii. 319 ; survives his wife, 344, n.
- Cadiz, Ponce de Leon, Marquis of, his opposition to the Guzmans, i. 300. See Leon.
- Calabria, invasion of, by Gonsalvo de Cordova, iii. 81 ; D'Aubigny despatched to, 101 ; reduced, 108.
- Calabria, the Duke of, at Tarento, iii. 81 ; guaranty to, 86 ; treatment of, 87. 460.
- Calatrava, grand-master of ; see Giron.
- Calatrava, knights of, i. 325.
- Cambray, League of, iii. 355 ; partition of the continental possessions of Venice thereby, 405 ; without principle or good policy, 406 ; its origin, 407.
- Canaries, historical notice of the, ii. 196, 197, n. ; Ximenes extends the Inquisition to, iii. 492.
- Cancionero, General, ii. 317 ; its literary value, ib. n.
- Cancioneros, publication of, ii. 317, n.
- Canosa, besieged, iii. 100 ; French sally out of, 109.
- Capmany, Antonio, notice of, and of his writings, i. 103, n.
- Capua, fate of, iii. 78.
- Carbajal, Lorenzo Galindez de, notice of, and of his writings, iii. 512, n. 537, n.
- Cardenas, Alonso de, grand-master of St. James, his enterprise in the district around Malaga, ii. 21. 24. 26. 30. 31. 33 ; intrusted with the assault on Baza, 131 ; escorts the infanta Isabella to Portugal, 161.
- Cardenas, Gutierre de, of the household of Isabella, facts respecting, i. 212.
- Cardona, Hugo de, commander of the forces raised by virtue of the Holy League, iii. 413 ; lays waste Venetian territories, 421.
- Carillo, Alphonso, archbishop of Toledo

- his character and influence, i. 177, 178 ; disgraced, 179 ; his league with the Marquis of Villena against the crown, ib. ; assists in deposing Henry IV. of Castile, 184 ; at the battle of Olmedo, 193 ; his disposition towards Isabella, 225 ; furnishes a body of horse to Ferdinand, 230 ; accompanies Isabella to Segovia, 235 ; his conduct towards Isabella, 256. 261 ; at the battle of Toro, 271. 273 ; purchases pardon, 276 ; his death, ii. 14 ; his imprisonment of Ximenes, 475.
- Carillo, the queen's magnanimity towards, iii. 354, n.
- Carlos, prince of Viana, his title to Navarre, i. 135 ; takes arms against his father, 136 ; is defeated, 138 ; released from captivity, 140 ; seeks an asylum with Alphonso V. at Naples, ib. ; urged to assert his title to the throne, after the death of Alphonso V, 141 ; his reception and manner of life in Sicily, ib. ; his reconciliation with his father, 142 ; negotiation for a union of, with Isabella, 144 ; imprisoned, ib. ; the consequences thereof, 145 ; released, 146 ; his reception by the people, 147 ; his sudden death, 148 ; his character, 149.
- Casa de Contratacion, powers intrusted to the, iii. 39.
- Casas, Las, ii. 257 ; on the treatment of the Indians, iii. 246, n. 563, 565, n. ; his memorial on the best means of arresting the destruction of the aborigines, 566, n. ; his appeal to Ferdinand in their behalf, 567.
- Castellaneto, expedition against, by the Duke of Nemours, iii. 112.
- Castile, condition of, in the middle of the fifteenth century, i. 2 ; characteristic traits of the people of, before the sixteenth century, 17. 18 ; its liberal political institutions, ib. ; first popular representation in, 22 ; the Hermandad organized, 27 ; opulence and splendour of the cities of, 28 ; its situation favourable to the rights of the aristocracy, 32 ; privileges and immunities of the higher nobility of, 33 ; knighthood regarded with especial favour in, 39 ; influence of the ecclesiastics in, 41 ; sacrifices in, made to the pope, 42 ; power granted to the commons of, 48 ; effect of the long minorities in, 50 ; dilapidated condition of the revenues at the beginning of the fourteenth century, 52 ; comparative power of the sovereign and people in, 54 ; state of, at the birth of Isabella, 107 ; accession of John II, 108 ; rise of Alvaro de Luna, 109 ; jealousy of the nobles, civil discord, 111 ; oppression of the commons in, 112 ; its consequences, 115 ; early literature of, 116 ; encouragement of literature there, under John II, 117 ; Henry, Marquis of Villena, 118 ; Inigo Lopez de Mendoza, Marquis of Santillana, 121 ; Juan de Mena, 123 ; minor luminaries, 125 ; epistolary and historical composition at this period, 127 ; decline of Alvaro de Luna, 128 ; his fall, 130 ; his execution, 131 ; accession of Henry IV, 169 ; oppression of the people in, 174 ; debasement of the coin there, 175 ; sale of papal bulls of crusade in, ib. n. ; Juan Pacheco and Alphonso Carillo, 177 ; interview of the king of, with Louis XI, 179 ; the consequences, 180 ; league of the nobles, 181 ; deposition of Henry IV, 184. 198 ; Alphonso publicly acknowledged and crowned, 184 ; consequent division of parties, 185 ; battle of Olmedo, 193 ; civil anarchy in, 195 ; death of Alphonso, 197 ; crown of, offered to Isabella, 199 ; treaty between Henry and the confederates in, 200 ; Isabella acknowledged heir to the crown of, 201 ; union of, with Aragon, by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella, 209 ; factions there, 223 ; civil anarchy, 225 ; War of the Succession ; Joanna's and Isabella's title to the crown of, considered, 249 ; accession of Ferdinand and Isabella, 251 ; invasion of, by Alphonso of Portugal, 258 ; disorderly retreat of the Castilian army, 263 ; its reorganization, 265. 267 ; battle of Toro, 270 ; submission of the whole kingdom of, 276 ; termination of the War of the Succession, 284 ; schemes of reform there, introduced after the accession of Isabella, 289 ; administration of justice in, ib. 302 ; tumult at Segovia, 295 ; reorganization of tribunals in, 306 ; codification of the laws there, 308 ; schemes for reducing the nobility of, 311 ; revocation of the royal grants, 313 ; military orders of, 321 ; masterships annexed to the crown of, 329, 330 ; ecclesiastical usurpations in, resisted, 333 ; regulation of trade in, 335 ; prosperity of the kingdom of, 337 ; influence of the royal authority in, 340 ; organization of the Inquisition in, 343. 358. 362 ; state of the Jews there, at the accession of Isabella, 356 ; their persecution, 358 ; papal bull authorizing the Inquisition

- in, 362; dreadful slaughter of the troops of, in the Azarquía, ii. 32; Columbus's application to the court of, 204; mental progress of, till the end of Isabella's reign, 272; classical literature in, 286; edict against the Moors of, 551; Philip's pretensions to the supremacy of, iii. 280; concord of Salamanca for the government of, 290. 294; sovereignty of, resigned to Philip and Joanna, 300; provisional government for, after the death of Philip, 330; disorderly state of, 344; distress of the kingdom, 345; Navarre united with, 437; Maximilian's pretensions to the regency of, 447; administration of, intrusted to Ximenes, 465, 466; Charles V. proclaimed king of, 488; public discontents in, 494; population there, 576; victims of the Inquisition in, 585, n. See Castilian literature, Ferdinand, and Ferdinand and Isabella.
- Castilian literature, its early state, i. 116; state of, during the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, ii. 272; Isabella's collection of books, 274; her care for the education of her children, 275; of Prince John, 277; of her nobles, 279; Peter Martyr, ib.; Lucio Marinæo Sículo, 281; scholarship of the nobles, 283; accomplished ladies, 285; classical learning, 286; Antonio de Lebrija, 287; Arias Barbosa, 288; merits of the Spanish scholars, 289; universities, 291; sacred studies, 293; other sciences, 294; printing introduced, and encouraged by the queen, 295; its rapid diffusion, 296; actual progress of science, 298; this reign an epoch in polite letters, 300; romances of chivalry, 301; ballads or romances, 305; lyric poetry, 317; publications of cancioneros, ib.; low state of lyric poetry, 320; rise of the Spanish drama, 323; tragic drama, 337; the foundation of, laid in the court of Ferdinand and Isabella, iii. 586; further remarks respecting Castilian poetry, its subsequent developement, ib. n.
- Castilian monarchy, view of the, before the fifteenth century, i. 1; election to the crown, 47; controlled, ib.
- Castillo, Enriquez del, notice of, i. 246, n.
- Castro, Bartolomeo de, employed in the compilation of the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399, n.
- Catalans, insurrection of the, i. 145; repulsed at Gerona, 155; reject the conciliatory advances of John, 166. See Catalonia.
- Catalina; see Catharine of Aragon.
- Catalonia, united to Aragon, i. 59; success of the navy of, 60; poetical talent in, 97; insurrection in, 145; feelings there in regard to Carlos, after his death, 153; general revolt in, 157; sovereignty of, offered to Henry IV. of Castile, 158; election of René le Bon, of Anjou, to the throne of, 160; liberation of serfs there, ii. 82; the court transfers its residence to, 242; attempt to assassinate Ferdinand in, ib.; loyalty of the people of, 243. See Catalans.
- Catharine of Lancaster, union of Henry III. with, i. 107.
- Catharine, succeeds Francis Phoebus, of Navarre, ii. 18; proposition for the union of, with John, son of Ferdinand and Isabella, ib.; her marriage with Jean d'Albret, 81. See Albret.
- Catharine of Aragon, her birth, ii. 81, n. 442, n.; her early education, 276, n.; her union with the house of England, 448, n.
- Catholic, the title of, conferred on Ferdinand and Isabella, ii. 377.
- Celestina, the tragi-comedy of, ii. 326; criticised, ib.; opened the way to dramatic writing, 327; numerous editions of it, 328.
- Celi, Medina, Duke of, Columbus's application to, ii. 207.
- Centurion, Domingo, sent as a legate by Pope Sixtus IV. to the court of Castile, i. 334.
- Cerdagne, pledged to the King of France, i. 156; revolt there, 228.
- Cerignola, Gonsalvo encamps at, iii. 131; battle of, 134. 174. 181; loss at, 137.
- Charles VIII. of France, his early education, ii. 358; his pretensions to Naples, 359; his negotiations respecting Roussillon, 361; counsellors of, in the pay of Ferdinand, 362; his measures for invading Italy, 365; sends an envoy to the Spanish court, 367; Ferdinand's special mission to him, 368; his dissatisfaction, 370; crosses the Alps with a formidable army, ib.; enters Rome, 371; second mission to, from Ferdinand, 379; his dissatisfaction, 380; enters Naples, 382; general hostility to him, 383; his indiscretion after the league of Venice, 387; his general conduct, 391; plunders works of art, 392; goes through the ceremony of coronation, 393; his retreat, ib.; his disregard for Italy, 413; his death, iii. 58; cause of his failure in Italy, 223.
- Charles V. (the First of Spain), birth of, iii. 118; proposal for the union of, with

- the Princess Claude, 120. 126 ; named king by Isabella, 243 ; made to assume the title of King of Castile, 347 ; regards himself as excluded by Ferdinand from his rightful possession, 448 ; Adrian, of Utrecht, preceptor of, and envoy to Ferdinand, 463 ; erects a marble mausoleum over the remains of Ferdinand and Isabella, 469 ; proclaimed king, 488 ; prepares to embark for his Spanish dominions, 496 ; his proposed union with the daughter of Francis I, ib. ; lands in Spain, 497 ; his ungrateful letter to Ximenes, 498 ; indebted to the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, 493.
- Charles of Bourbon, his generous conduct to the heirs of Giannone, iii. 558, n.
- Chivalry, circumstances favourable to, in Spain, i. 16 ; romances of, 325 ; continuance of, in Spain, iii. 579. See Military orders.
- Christians, sold as slaves, i. 176, ii. 20 ; treatment of, by the Spanish Arabs, i. 390 ; liberation of, ii. 70 ; release of, at Malaga, 115 ; at Oran, iii. 382.
- Church of Rome, measures for preventing usurpations by the, i. 331 ; resisted by the cortes of Castile, 332 ; treatment of the, by the sovereigns, iii. 521. See Pope.
- Church plate, appropriation of, for the support of the royal treasury, i. 266.
- Cicero, his country-seat, iii. 182, n.
- Cid, remarks on the, i. 14.
- Cifuentes, Don Juan de Silva, count of, ii. 22.
- Cisneros, Francisco Ximenes de. See Ximenes.
- Classical literature, in Spain, ii. 286.
- Claude, the princess, daughter of Louis XII, iii. 120. 126.
- Clemencin, Diego, author of the sixth volume of the "Memoirs of the Royal Spanish Academy of History," i. 342, n.
- Clergy, on the education of the, in Spain, ii. 293 ; their habits, 498 ; their opposition to Talavera's mild policy for the conversion of the Moors, 510 ; the queen's measures for circumscribing the powers of the, iii. 521 ; their wealth, ib. n. ; the queen's care of their morals, 522. See Ecclesiastics.
- Coin, debasement of, in Castile, i. 175. 336 ; enactments respecting, 337.
- Colonies, careful provision made for the, ii. 33 ; emigration to the, encouraged, 34 ; license for private voyages to the, iii. 36 ; spirit of the legislation of the, 41 ; trade of, confined to Seville, 42 ; articles of commerce in the, 46 ; slavery there, 564 ; administration of the government of the, 568. See Hispaniola and West Indies.
- Colonna, Prospero, sent to harass the French, iii. 204 ; his visit to Isabella, 239, n. ; successor to Gonsalvo, at Naples, 351.
- Columbus, Christopher, early history of, ii. 198 ; his belief of land in the west, 199. 202 ; applies to Portugal, 203 ; to the court at Castile, 204 ; his case referred to a council, 205 ; his application rejected, 206 ; his application to Medina Sidonia and Medina Celi, 207 ; prepares to leave Spain, ib. ; interposition in his behalf, 208 ; present at the surrender of Granada, 209 ; urges his suit before Ferdinand and Isabella, 210 ; the nature of his demands, ib. ; Isabella favourable towards, 212 ; final arrangement with, 213 ; sails on his first voyage, 215 ; indifference to his enterprise, 216 ; his tribute to Isabella, 218, n. ; returns from his voyage, 246 ; invited to Barcelona, ib. ; the West Indies discovered by, 247 ; his visit to Portugal, ib. ; his reception by John II, 248, n. ; his reception at Palos, 248 ; his progress to Barcelona, 249 ; his reception at the court, 250 ; his interview with the sovereigns, 251 ; sensations caused by his discovery, 252 ; royal attentions shown to, at Barcelona, 254 ; preparations for his second voyage, 258, 259. 265 ; instructions to, respecting the natives, 257 ; new powers granted to, 259 ; sails on his second voyage, 265 ; complaints against him, iii. 6 ; his second return, 7 ; reaction of public feeling respecting him, 8 ; the queen's confidence in him unshaken, 9 ; honours conferred on him, 10 ; difficulties as to his third voyage, 11 ; sails, 12 ; discovers terra firma, ib. ; his endeavours to quell the mutiny at Hispaniola, 13 ; loud complaints against him, 14 ; superseded in his government, and sent to Spain by Bobadilla, 19 ; his reception, 21 ; Ovando commissioned in his stead, 24 ; remarks respecting the delay to send him out, 26 ; equipment for his fourth and last voyage, 28 ; his despondency, 29 ; last letter of the sovereigns to him, 30 ; sails, 31 ; forbidden to touch at Hispaniola, though in distress, ib. ; remarkable fate of his enemies, 32 ; dissatisfied with the license for private voyages, 37, n. ; affected by the death of Isabella, 254 ; his return from his last voyage, 305 ; learns la-

- bella's death, 306; his illness, 307; visits the court, 308; unjust treatment of, by Ferdinand, 309; declines in health and spirits, 311; his death, ib.; his person and habits, 313; his enthusiasm, 314; his lofty character, 315; remarks respecting the family of, ib. n.
 Columbus, Diego, son of Christopher Columbus, iii. 315, n.
 Columbus, Ferdinand, his History of, the Admiral, iii. 56, n.; notice of, 315, n.
 Comines, minister of Charles VIII, at Venice, ii. 384. 386.
 Commerce of Granada, i. 407.
 Commons of Castile, treatment of the, by John I, i. 31; permanent committee of the, resides at court, 48, n.; power granted to the, 107; oppression of the, 112; its consequences, 115; state of the, under the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, iii. 523; their consideration, 525.
 Complutensian Polyglot Bible; see Polyglot.
 Concubinage, practised by the clergy in Spain, i. 43.
 Conde, his works respecting the Moors, i. 428, n.
 Condottieri, mercenaries in Italy, described, ii. 372.
 Confiscation decreed against heretics, i. 374.
 Coplas, by Don Jorge Manrique, ii. 322.
 Cordova, Alonso Hernandez de; see Aguilar.
 Cordova, Diego Fernandez de, i. 39.
 Cordova, Gonsalvo de, a negotiator of a treaty for the surrender of Granada, ii. 74; land forces against Charles VIII. entrusted to, 378; his early life, 396; his brilliant qualities, 399; his gallantry to the queen, ib.; raised to the Italian command, 400; arrives in Sicily, 401; lands in Calabria, 402; his prudence in regard to the battle of Seminara, 404; his bravery, 407; his retreat to Reggio, 408; his movements in southern Calabria, 411; his successes, 412; summoned to the aid of Ferdinand, in Atella, 415; surprises Laino, 416; arrives before Atella, 418; receives the title of Great Captain, 419; beats a detachment of Swiss, 420; succours the pope, by storming and capturing Ostia, 430; enters Rome, 431; his reception by the pope, ib.; by Frederic, at Naples, 432; returns to Spain, 433; marches against Huejar, 530; fleet fitted out under, iii. 67; sails against the Turks, 72; storms and captures St. George, 73; honours paid to, 74; conduct of, towards Frederic, 80; invades Calabria, 81; invests Tarento, 82; his munificence, 83; punishes a mutiny, 84; Tarento surrenders to, 86; his forces, 97; retires to Barleta, 99; his spirit, 107; routs the French, 110; captures Ruvo, 113; returns to Barleta, 115; his treatment of the prisoners, ib.; prepares to leave Barleta, 117; refuses to comply with the conditions of the treaty of Lyons, 128; marches out of Barleta, 129; distress of the troops under, 130; encamps before Cerignola, 131; his forces, 133; routs the French, 136; pursues the enemy, 138; his entry into Naples, 141; his movements against Gaeta, 142. 144; concessions to, by the pope, 174; sends a detachment near to the city of Rome, 179; repulsed before Gaeta, 181; strength of his forces, 182; takes post at San Germano, 183; his bloody resistance at the bridge of Garigliano, 188; strengthens his position, 191; great distress of the army of, ib.; his remarkable resolution, 192; secures the alliance of the Orsini, 200; crosses the Garigliano, and pursues the French, 204; routs the enemy, 207; his treatment of the Angevin lords, 212, n.; his courtesy to the vanquished, 213; takes possession of Gaeta, 215; his enthusiastic reception, 216; extortions and clamours of the troops under, 217; his liberality to his officers, 218; review of his military conduct, 224; his reform of the military service, 225; his influence over the army, 226; his confidence in the character of the Spaniards, 227; his politic deportment to the Italians, 228; position of his army, 229; results of the campaigns under, 230; memoirs of, 231, n.; affected by the death of Isabella, 254; distrusted by Ferdinand, 323; loyalty of, 324; his reception of Ferdinand, at Naples, 336; Ferdinand's confidence in, 349; grief of the Neapolitans at his departure, 351; compliments to, by Louis XII, 355; his reception in Spain, and progress through the country, 364; Ferdinand breaks his word to, 365; propositions for the marriage of his daughter, 366; withdraws from court, 367; his splendid retirement, 368; ordered to Italy, 449; zeal to enlist under, ib.; again distrusted by Ferdinand, and ordered to disband his levies, 450; writes to

- Ferdinand, and goes into retirement, 451 ; prepares to embark for Flanders, 454 ; his illness and death, 455 ; public grief, ib. ; his character, 457 ; his private virtues, 458 ; his want of faith, 459 ; his loyalty, 461.
- Cordova, Pedro de, Marquis of Priego, Ferdinand's severity towards, iii. 361 ; respect shown by, to the remains of Ferdinand, 468.
- Cordova, persecutions of, i. 391, n. ; embellishment of, by the Arabs, 394 ; great mosque of, ib. ; population of, 399 ; literature and education in, 400 ; dismemberment of the empire of, 403 ; troubles in, from the Inquisition, iii. 320.
- Coronation, forms of, in Castile, i. 252.
- Coronel, Paulo, employed in the compilation of the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399, n.
- Corral, Juan de, justice inflicted on, ii. 20.
- Cortes of Aragon, composed of four branches, i. 71 ; their several privileges and powers, 72, 76 ; their manner of conducting business, 74 ; judicial functions of, 78 ; their control over the government, 80 ; compared with that of Castile, 81 ; remonstrate against the Inquisition, ii. 84 ; recognise Philip and Joanna, iii. 121.
- Cortes of Castile, pass acts respecting the nobility, i. 316 ; resist the usurpations of the church, 332 ; pass acts respecting coin, 337 ; proceedings of, respecting the succession, after the decease of Isabella, iii. 277 ; convocation of, after the death of Philip, 331. 333 ; meeting of, 340.
- Council, Royal, reorganization of the, i. 540, iii. 304.
- Councils, organization of, iii. 538.
- Cretensis, Demetrius, employed in the compilation of the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399, n.
- Cross, the standard of the, ii. 69.
- Crusades, opened the way to the Inquisition, i. 344.
- Currency, laws establishing uniformity in the, iii. 543.
- Cuxar, surrender of, ii. 129.
- D.
- Darien, isthmus of, crossed by Vasco Nunez de Balboa, iii. 562.
- Daru, Count, his "Histoire de Venise," iii. 423, n.
- Deza, Diego de, archbishop of Seville, favours the project of Columbus, ii. 206 ; notice of, ib. n. ; an inquisitor, iii. 321 ; succeeded by Ximenes, 371.
- Discoveries, the early, made by the Spaniards, ii. 196 ; moral consequences of the western, iii. 51 ; progress in, 561.
- Dominican friars, punishment of heresy committed to, i. 345.
- Donzeles, account of the, ii. 39, n.
- Dorset, Marquis of ; see Grey.
- Drama, Spanish, rise of the, ii. 322 ; the tragi-comedy of "Celestina," 324 ; Juan de la Encina, 329 ; Torres de Naharro, 331 ; low condition of the stage, 336 ; tragic drama, 337 ; Fernan Perez de Oliva, ib.
- Duelling, prohibited, i. 316 ; practised, 410.
- Duponcet, his "Histoire de Gonsalve de Cordoue," iii. 232, n.
- E.
- Early literature of Castile, i. 116. See Castile.
- Ecclesiastics, influence of, in Castile, i. 41 ; their licentiousness, 43 ; their great wealth, 44, 45, n. ; chastisement of, by Isabella, ii. 80. See Clergy.
- Education, under Alhakem II, i. 400 ; provisions for, 418 ; the results, 419. See Moors.
- Egypt, the mission from the Sultan of, to Ferdinand and Isabella, ii. 137.
- Elizabeth of England, Isabella compared with, iii. 267.
- El Zagal ; see Ahdallah.
- Emanuel, successor of John II. of Portugal, ii. 445 ; union of, with the infanta Isabella, ib. 455 ; banishes the Jews from Portugal, 456.
- Encina, Juan de la, notice of, ii. 329 ; his dramatic eclogues, 330.
- Enriquez, Fadrique, admiral of Castile, commander of a Spanish armada to carry Joanna to Flanders, ii. 450.
- Epila, Pedro Arbues de, inquisitor in Saragossa, ii. 83. See Arbues.
- Erasmus, on the science and literature of Spain, under Isabella, iii. 575, n.
- Europe, state of, at the close of the fifteenth century, ii. 346 ; character of reigning sovereigns in, 347 ; improved political and moral condition of, 348 ; more intimate relations between states, 349 ; foreign relations conducted by the sovereign, 350 ; Italy the school of politics, 351 ; alarmed at the French invasion in Italy, 365 ; effect of the administration of Ferdinand and Isabella on, iii. 514.
- Exports from Spain, in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, iii. 547.
- Eymerich, his instructions relative to Inquisitions, i. 346 ; cited, ib. n.
- F.
- Ferdinand I. of Aragon, his application to the city of Barcelona, i. 59 ; short reign of, 134 ; succeeded by Alphonso V, 135.

Ferdinand the Catholic, his birth, i. 139 ; sworn heir to the crown, 153 ; renunciation of allegiance to, by the Catalans, 157 ; his junction with Joan, before Gerona, the consequences, 162 ; his narrow escape, ib. ; negotiations for his marriage, 164. 204. 208 ; articles of marriage, 209 ; enters Castile, 215 ; his private interview with Isabella, 216 ; his personal appearance, ib. ; his marriage, 218 ; raises the siege before Perpignan, 231 ; his reception by Henry IV. at Segovia, 236 ; summoned to the assistance of his father in Aragon, 237. 239 ; his summary execution of justice, in the case of Gordo, 240 ; marches against Alphonso, King of Portugal, 261 ; challenges him to personal combat, 262 ; retreats, 263 ; reorganizes the army, and proceeds to Zamora, 268 ; overtakes Alphonso on the retreat, 270 ; engages in the battle of Toro, 271 ; his humanity, 275 ; his visit to his father, 281, n. ; marches towards Alhama, 448. 455 ; raises the second siege, 457 ; his unsuccessful attempt on Loja, ii. 4. 7 ; the first monarch to send embassies to foreign powers, 15 ; his first interference in the politics of Italy, 16 ; his treatment of Abdallah, 44. 46 ; his terms to the vanquished Moors, 54 ; his body-guard, 60 ; his meeting with the queen in the camp, before Moclin, 66 ; his costume, 67 ; his conduct in relation to the Inquisition in Aragon, 82 ; Inquisition throughout his dominions, 87 ; his expedition to Velez Malaga, 90 ; narrow escape of, 92 ; his haughty demeanour to the embassy from besieged Malaga, 111 ; his wary device respecting the plate, 118 ; assumes the command of the army at Murcia, 124 ; makes inroads into Granada, ib. ; his measures for the reduction of Baza, 128 ; takes command of the army, 129 ; names of the distinguished cavaliers who usually attended, ib. n. ; his treatment of the people of Baza, 147 ; his interview with El Zagal, 150 ; occupation of his domain, 151 ; devastates Granada, 162 ; confers knighthood on his son, Prince John, ib. ; his policy in regard to Guadix, and other cities, 163 ; musters his forces, in 1491, for the closing campaign against Granada, 165 ; encamps in the Vega, 166 ; disapproves

the stipulations demanded by Columbus, 210 ; attempt on the life of, 242 ; his slow recovery, 244 ; punishment of the assassin, 245 ; early education of, neglected, 272 ; foreign politics directed by, 345 ; his determination respecting the crown of Naples, 367 ; sends an envoy to the French court, 368 ; his conduct in relation to the expedition of Charles VIII, 376. 379 ; makes naval preparations, 378 ; his second mission to Charles VIII, 379 ; bold conduct of his envoys, 380 ; his views respecting Naples, 435 ; his fame, acquired by the war, 436 ; mediates a peace between Henry VII. and the King of Scots, 448, n. ; takes the field, and marches toward the mountains of Granada, 532 ; the rebels submit to, 546 ; his negotiations with Venice, iii. 63 ; with the Emperor Maximilian, 64 ; his views and measures in regard to the French invasion of Italy, 66 ; his partition of Naples with Louis XII, 68. 70 ; ground of his claim to Naples, 71 ; his rupture with France, 90 ; his instructions to Philip to make a treaty with Louis XII, 125 ; rejects the treaty, 147 ; his policy examined, 148 ; his measures in regard to the French invasion, 159 ; his successes, 161 ; suffers from speculative writers, 168, n. ; his treaty with Louis XII, 221 ; named Regent of Castile in the testament of Isabella, 243 ; the queen's provision for, 244 ; resigns the crown of Castile to Philip, 275 ; assumes the title of administrator of Castile, 276, 277 ; unpopular, 280. 296 ; his perplexities, 282 ; proposals for his second marriage, 284 ; his marriage with the Princess Germaine, 286. 292 ; his impolitic treaty with France, 288 ; has an interview with Philip, 297 ; his courteous deportment, 298 ; his resignation of the regency, 300 ; his second interview with Philip, 303 ; his departure, ib. ; his disposition towards Columbus, 308 ; his unjust treatment of him, 309 ; the purpose of perverting his pension, 319 ; his distrust of Gonsalvo, 323 ; sails for Naples, 324 ; his deportment towards Gonsalvo, ib. 349 ; his reception, 334 ; his entry into Naples, 336 ; summons a parliament and restores the Angevins, 337 ; his politic behaviour respecting Castile, 346 ; allegiance to, 347 ; leaves Naples, ib. ; his brilliant interview with Louis XII, 352 ; reception of, in Castile, 356 ; his

- interview with Joanna, 357; irregularity of his proceedings, 359; grants a general amnesty, ib.; establishes a guard, 360; his excessive severity, 361; his treatment of Gonsalvo, 365; policy of his severity, 370; Ximenes's distrust of, 384; his visit to the university of Alcalá, 395; spoil assigned to, by the league of Cambray, 405; remonstrates with Louis XII. against his aggressions on the church, 411; the pope grants him the investiture of Naples, and other favours, 412; becomes a party in the Holy League, 413; his distrust of Navarre, 426; demands a passage for his army through Navarre, 428. 441; effects a truce with Louis XII, 435; settles his conquests, ib.; unites Navarre with Castile, 437; examination of his conduct respecting Navarre, 438; his aversion for his grandson Charles V, 448; orders Gonsalvo to Italy, 449; distrusts him, and orders him to disband his levies, 450; Gonsalvo's complaint to, 451; his desire for children, 452; decline of his health, 453; perplexed by Gonsalvo's movements, 454; his conduct on occasion of Gonsalvo's death, 455; his illness increases, 462; insensible to his situation, 463; jealous of Adrian of Utrecht, his grandson's envoy, ib.; his last hours, 464; his wills, ib.; his disposition of the regency, 465; his death and testament, 466; intrusts the administration of Castile to Ximenes, ib.; his death, 467; his reign, ib.; his remains transported to Granada, 468; his person and character, 470; his education, ib.; his temperance and economy, 471; dies poor, 472; his bigotry, 473; accused of hypocrisy, 474; conduct of, in regard to the Inquisition in Aragon, ib.; charged with perfidy, 475; his shrewd policy, 476; his insensibility, 478; contrasted with Isabella, 479; natural children of, ib. n.; gloomy close of his life, 480; his kingly qualities, 482; judgment of his contemporaries, 483; arbitrary measures of, 530; maintains slavery in the New World, 566.
- Ferdinand II, of Naples, succeeds Alphonso II, ii. 382; makes a descent on the southern extremity of Calabria, 396; commences operations, 401; marches on Seminara, 402; his conduct in regard to the battle near Seminara, 404; defeated, 406; his perilous situation, ib.; recovers Naples, 410; besieges Montpensier, in Atella, 414; his death, 423.
- Ferdinand, son of Philip and Joanna, born, iii. 153; government of Castile and Aragon to be committed to, 464; his grandfather's anxiety respecting, ib.; grants to, 466.
- Ferdinand and Isabella, genealogy of, i. 106; their marriage disconcerts the operations of the Marquis of Villena, 222; their poverty and perplexities, 224; negotiations for the marriage of their daughter, Isabella, with the Dauphin of France, 237; their accession, 252; comparative powers and rights of, 253; their exertions and measures for reorganizing the Castilian army, 267; submission of the whole kingdom of Castile to, 276; their scheme of reform for the government of Castile, 289; their progress through Andalusia, 302; their reorganization of the tribunals, 306; preside in courts of justice, 307; their difference with Pope Sixtus IV. 332; their treatment of his legate, 334; their regulation of trade, 335; pre-eminence of their authority, 340; their conduct after the fall of Alhama, 448; their resources, ii. 20; anecdote illustrative of their regard to justice, 21; take measures to procure artillery, 50; their policy towards the nobles, 58; composition of their army, 60; Swiss mercenaries, 61; the English Lord Scales, 62; disapprove the magnificence displayed, 64; their meeting in the camp before Moclin, 66; their devout demeanour, 67; Slidell's remarks on the armour of, ib. n.; their ceremonies on the occupation of a new city, 69; their standard of the cross, ib.; their liberation of Christian captives, 70; their policy in fomenting the Moorish factions, 71; an attempt to assassinate, 104; their entrance into Malaga, 115; their measures for repeopling Malaga, 121; return to Cordova, 122; visit Aragon in 1487, 123; occupied with the interior government of Castile, 125; their reception of an embassy from Maximilian, 126; their resources, ib. n.; embassy to, from the Sultan of Egypt, 137; their return to Jaen, 153; summon Abdallah to surrender the capital of Granada, 161; their survey of the city of Granada, 169; their entrance into it, 179; their early interest in navigation and commerce, 196; Columbus applies to, 204. 210; their final arrangement with Columbus, 212; awed by Torquemada's violent conduct respecting the Jews, 223; their edict for the expulsion of the Jews, 224. 236; visit Aragon, 241; invite Columbus to Barcelona, 246; their reception of him, 251; their interview with him, 252; make preparation for his second voyage, 258. 265; their exertions for the conversion of the natives, 257; their instructions respecting them, 258; their application to the court of Rome, 259; their wary diplomacy in sending an ambassador to Lisbon, 264; inform John II. that Columbus has sailed on his second voyage, 266; adjustment of their difficulty with John II. by the treaty of Tordesillas, 268; operation of their administration on the intellectual, literary, and scientific character of the nation, 271; their reign an epoch in polite letters, 300; national spirit of the literature of this epoch, 301; their treaty with Charles VIII, 363; the title of Catholic conferred on them by the pope, 377; their family, 442; their temperate sway in regard to the conversion of the Moors, 511; displeased on occasion of the revolt of the Albaycin, 524; their edict against the Moors of Castile, 551; loud complaints to, against Columbus, iii. 13; their reception of Columbus when sent home by Bobadilla, 21; vindication of them, 23; their last letter to Columbus, 30; make careful provision for the colonies, 33; liberal grants, 34; their independent attitude in regard to the pope, 40; spirit of the colonial legislation under, ib.; alarmed by the French conquests in Italy, iii. 62; their remonstrance to the pope, ib.; solicit Philip and Joanna to visit Spain, 119. 121; seized with fever, 237; their burial-place, 250; marble mausoleum erected over their remains by Charles V, 469; their characters contrasted, 479; general review of the administration of, 514; their policy at their accession, 515; their depression of the nobles, ib.; raise men of humble station to offices of the highest trust, 516; state of the commons under, 523; the promulgation of pragmaticus or royal ordinances by, 527, 528, n.; advancement of prerogative under, 528; legal compilations, 536; organization of councils, 538; legal profession advanced by, 540; character of the laws, 541; erroneous principles of their legislation, 544; economical policy under, 552; internal improvements under, 554; increase of empire, 557; their government of Naples, ib.; their revenues from the Indies, 559, 568; spirit of adventure in their reign, 561; progress of discovery, ib.; their colonial administration, 566; general prosperity under, 575; chivalrous spirit of the people under, 583; their reign the period of national glory, 588. See Castile, Ferdinand, Isabella, and Spain.

Ferrier, St. Vincent, his miracles for the conversion of the Jews, i. 354.

Feudal institutions, decay of, ii. 346.

Florida discovered, iii. 562.

Foix, Gaston de, Duke de Nemours, and brother of the Queen of Aragon, commander of the French army in Italy, iii. 414; his death, 416; his character, 417; effects of his death on the French army, 419.

Foix, Jean de, the daughter of, married to Ferdinand, iii. 286.

Fonseca, Antonio de, sent on a mission to Charles VIII, ii. 379; his bold conduct, 380; his hostility to Columbus, iii. 11; proprietor of slaves, 565, n.

Foreigners, encouraged to settle in Spain, iii. 554.

France, treaties between and Aragon, i. 156. 231; visited by Alphonso of Portugal, 278; makes peace with Castile, 281; rupture of, with Spain, iii. 90; her control over Italy, 173; effects of the rout of the Garigliano on, 211; treaty with, 286; its impolicy, 288. See Charles and Louis.

Frederic II. of Prussia, his treatment of the Jews, ii. 238, n.

Frederic II. of Naples, successor of Ferdinand II, ii. 424; his acts, ib.; his reception of Gonsalvo, 432; threatened by Louis XII, iii. 64; his applications for aid, 65; his attempts at self-defence, 77; his fate, 78; remarks respecting him, 79. 164; mediator of a truce between France and Spain, 163.

French army; see Mantua.

French chronicles, notices of, iii. 232, n.

Funerals, Isabella's preamble respecting, iii. 241. 261, n.; laws respecting, 545.

G.

Gaeta, Gonsalvo's movements against, iii. 142. 144; relief sent to, by Louis XII, 176. 181; Gonsalvo repulsed before, 181; the French retreat to, 204. 208; capitulation of, 210; the Spaniards occupy, 215.

Gardens before Baza, ii. 131; cleared of their timber, 136.

- Garigliano, armies on the, iii. 169 ; the French encamp there, 183 ; bloody passage of the bridge of, 187 ; distresses of the Spanish army on the, 191 ; of the French army there, 195 ; crossed by the Spaniards, 203 ; rout of the, 207 ; its effects on France, 213.
- Gebalfaro, ii. 94 ; surrender of, 116.
- Gelves, discomfiture of Navarro in the island of, iii. 388 ; cause of the disaster in, ib. n.
- Genealogy of Ferdinand and Isabella, i. 106.
- General Privilege, the Magna Charta of Aragon, i. 77.
- Germaine, the princess, married to Ferdinand, iii. 286. 292 ; facts respecting, 287 ; her coolness towards Gonsalvo, 366 ; delivered of a son, 452 ; Ferdinand's bequests to, 466 ; her subsequent marriages, ib. n.
- Giannone, Charles's generous conduct to the heirs of, iii. 558, n.
- Giovio, Paolo, remarks on, ii. 425, n. ; his Life of Gonsalvo de Cordova, iii. 231, n.
- Girona, Queen Joan seeks refuge there from the Catalans, i. 154 ; the Duke of Lorraine compelled to abandon the siege of, 162.
- Giron, Pedro, proposition for the marriage of, with Isabella, i. 189. 191 ; his character, 191 ; his death, 192.
- Giron, Pedro de, opposes royal officers, iii. 494.
- Gold in the West Indies, iii. 47. 559.
- Gomez, de Castro Alvaro, notice of, and of his works, ii. 500, n. ; his tribute to Carbajal, iii. 513, n.
- Gonsalvo ; see Cordova, Gonsalvo de.
- Gordo, Ximenes, of Saragossa, Ferdinand's summary execution of, i. 239.
- Goths ; see Visigoths.
- Grahame, Mr. remarks on his History, iii. 44. n.
- Grain, scarcity of, ii. 128, n.
- Gralla, Spanish minister at the court of Paris, instructions to, in relation to the partition of Naples, iii. 66.
- Granada, the kingdom of, in the middle of the fifteenth century, i. 2 ; description of, 405 ; etymologies of the word, 406, n. ; agriculture and commerce of, 407 ; resources of the crown of, 408 ; Luxurious character of the people of, 410 ; her successful resistance against the Christians, 414 ; the war of, 435 ; Isabella's measures for carrying on the war of, 456 ; unsuccessful attempt on Loja, ii. 4 ; revolution in, 12 ; measures for carrying on the war there, in 1483, 19 ; expedition to the Axarquia, 22 ; battle of Lucerna and capture of Abdallah, 41 ; general policy of the war of, 46 ; further preparations for the war with, 49. 55 ; composition of the Spanish army, 60 ; its magnificent appearance, 63 ; Christian conquests, 74 ; authorities for the war of, 75, n. ; expedition to Velez, 90 ; to Malaga, 94 ; fate of, decided, 121 ; inroads into, 124 ; border war in, 125 ; measures for the reduction of Baza in, 128 ; its surrender, 147 ; occupation of El Zagal's domain, 150 ; difficulties of the campaign in, 153 ; Abdallah summoned to surrender the capital of, 161 ; Ferdinand ravages, 162, 163 ; preparations for the closing campaign against, 165 ; position of the capital of, 167 ; its capitulation, 174 ; termination of the war of, 183 ; its results, 184 ; moral influence of the war of, 185 ; its military influence, 186 ; authorities in relation to the war of—Bernaldez, 190, n.—Irving, 192, n. ; effects of the war of, on Spain, 437 ; tranquil state of, till 1499, 506 ; measures for converting the Moors in, 509. 525. 558 ; rising of the Moors at the Alpuxarras, 530 ; Huejar sacked, 531 ; Lanjaron captured, 532 ; revolt of the Sierra Vermeja, 535 ; tranquillity restored to, 547 ; evasion of the treaty of, by the Christians, 558 ; its union with Castile, iii. 556 ; chivalrous spirit in the war of, 580.
- Granada, city of, described, i. 405 ; summoned to surrender, ii. 161 ; its position, 167 ; numerous combats near, 168 ; surveyed by Ferdinand and Isabella, 169 ; skirmish before, 170 ; conflagration of the Christian camp before, 171 ; city of Santa Fé built near, 173 ; propositions by Abdallah for the surrender of, 174 ; its capitulation, ib. ; the conditions, 175 ; commotions in, 176 ; preparations for occupying 177 ; effects of the fall of, throughout Christendom, 181 ; revolt of the Albaycin, 520 ; conversion of Moors at, 525 ; the burial-place of Ferdinand and Isabella, iii. 250. 468 ; population of, 576, n.
- Greek manuscripts, furnished to Ximenes by the pope, iii. 397.
- Grey, Thomas, Marquis of Dorset, his co-operation with Ferdinand, iii. 427 ; his discontent and return to England, 433.
- Guadix, in the domain of El Zagal, ii. 128 ; guarded by Cidi Yahye, 131 ; El Zagal at, 146 ; occupation of, 151 ; Ferdinand's policy in regard to, 163.

- Guicciardini, remarks on, ii. 425, n.
 Guienne, the Duke of, Joanna affianced to, i. 222, 223; his death, 233.
 Guienne, expedition against, iii. 427.
 Guzman, Henrique de; see Sidonia.
 Guzman, Nunez de, a distinguished scholar, ii. 289, n.
 Guzmans, their factions with the family of Ponce de Leon, i. 226. 298.

H.

- Hacen, Muley Abul, surprises Zahara, i. 436; besieges Alhama, 449; expelled from Granada, ii. 12; his opposition to the Christians in their expedition to the Axarquia, 25; his death, 72.
 Hallam, Henry, notice of, i. 103, n.; his remarks on the Epistles of Peter Martyr, ii. 158; cited respecting penal statutes against the Catholics under Elizabeth, iii. 258, n.; his character of Elizabeth, 269, n.
 Heathen, bigoted views in relation to the, ii. 15. See Indians.
 Henriquez, Frederic, punishment of, i. 320.
 Henriquez, Pedro, aids in the expedition against Alhama, i. 441; Adelantado of Andalusia, his connexion with the expedition to the Axarquia, ii. 23, 24; his escape, 33.
 Henry III. of Castile, his device for the recovery of his estates, i. 51; union of, with Catharine of Lancaster, 107; his death, 108.
 Henry IV. of Castile, his accession and popularity, i. 169; disappoints expectations, 171; his dissolute habits, 172; his repudiation of Blanche of Aragon, ib.; his marriage with Joanna, 173; controlled by favourites of humble origin, 176; his interview with Louis XI. on the banks of the Bidassoa, 179; the consequences, 180; nobles league against, 181; his breach of faith with the confederates, 183; deposed near the city of Avila, 184; has recourse to negotiation, 187; disbands his forces, 188; not present in person at the action of Olmedo, 194; treaty of, with the confederates, 200; threatens Isabella with imprisonment, 207; his approbation of the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella solicited, 215. 219; opposes the pretensions of Joanna to those of Isabella, 222. 251; meets French ambassadors, 223; his interview with Isabella, at Segovia, 235; his illness and death, 243. 251; influence of his reign, 245. 289.
 Henry VII. of England, his reception

- and entertainment of Philip and Joanna, iii. 291.
 Heresy, punishment of, i. 345. 348, n.; iii. 584, n.
 Hermandad, or Holy Brotherhood, an association in Castile, i. 27; a confederacy, 196; reorganization of the, 290; code of the, 292; opposed by the nobility, 293; remonstrance against it, 312; sanctioned in Aragon, ii. 123; Leyes de la, iii. 537.
 Herrera, Antonio de, notice of him, and his works, ii. 57, n.
 Hispaniola, misconduct of the colonists at, ii. 5; mutiny there, 12; oppression of the natives, 13; Columbus forbidden to enter the harbour at, 31; progress of the settlement there, 34; liberal grants for emigration to, ib.; persons prohibited from going to, 35; license for private voyages to, 36; Ximenes sends a commission to, iii. 491; gold drawn from, 559; introduction of sugar-cane into, ib. See Colonies and West Indies.
 Holy Brotherhood; see Hermandad.
 Holy League, between Julius II, Ferdinand, and Venice, iii. 413.
 Horses, laws respecting, iii. 547.
 Hospitals, Isabella said to be the first to institute camp, iii. 266.
 House of Trade, iii. 39.
 Huejar sacked, ii. 531.
 Humboldt, his "Histoire de la Géographie du Nouveau Continent," ii. 202, n.

I.

- Illescas, heroism of, iii. 188.
 India House, origin of the, ii. 255.
 Indian Affairs, Board of, established, ii. 255.
 Indians, accompany Columbus to Spain, ii. 250; measures for the conversion of, 252. 257; accompany Columbus on his second return to Spain, iii. 7; bigoted views in regard to, 15; declared free, 25; Isabella's zeal for converting them, 43; their diminution, 45. 246, n.; Isabella's care for them, 563; subsequent treatment of them, ib.
 Indies, Council of the, iii. 540; revenues from the, 559.
 Indulgences, sale of papal, for the prosecution of the Moorish war, i. 175.
 Infantado, Duke of, his style of living described by Navagiero, iii. 519, n.
 Inglis, his "Spain in 1830," cited, iii. 550, n.
 Inquisition, establishment of the, i. 343. See Ancient Inquisition and Modern Inquisition.

Internal improvements in Spain, iii. 554.
Intolerance, remarks on, ii. 554, iii. 257.

See Toleration.

Irving, Washington, his description of Ahdallah, ii. 181; his "Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada," 192; his "History of Columbus," iii. 57, n.

Isabella, the grand-daughter of John I. of Portugal, her marriage with John II. of Castile, i. 129; her death, ii. 451.

Isabella, the Catholic, her birth, i. 133. 169; negotiation for her union with Carlos, 144. 190; further negotiations for her marriage, 166, n., 191; her projected union with the grand master of Calatrava, ib.; her education, 189; crown of Castile offered to, 199; declined, 200; acknowledged heir to the crown, 201; suitors to, 202, 203, 204; her marriage with Ferdinand, 204. 208, 209. 218; menaced with imprisonment, 207; her critical situation, 211; her private interview with Ferdinand, 216; personal appearance of, 217; her pretensions opposed to those of Joanna, 222; her reliance on the Archbishop of Toledo, 225; the party of, gains strength, 233; has an interview with Henry IV. at Segovia, 235; basis of her title to the crown, 249; proclaimed queen, 251; her exertions and success in raising an army to oppose Alphonso of Portugal, 260; her thanksgiving for the victory at Toro, 275; takes active measures for the defence of the western borders, 281; her schemes of reform, 289; see Castile; her presence of mind and suppression of the tumults at Segovia, 296; her visit to Seville, 298; her execution of justice, 299. 301; endeavours to reconcile the families of Guzman and Ponce de Leon, 300; her progress through Andalusia in 1478, 302; her conduct in the case of Alvaro Yanez de Lugo, ib.; of Frederic Henriquez, 319; see Ferdinand and Isabella; makes her court a nursery of virtue and generous ambition, 340; tendency of her administration, 341; state of the Jews at her accession, 355; influenced by the bigotry of the age, anecdote, 360; character of her confessor, Torquemada, 361; solicits a papal bull for the introduction of the Inquisition into Castile, 362; resorts to milder measures, 363; enforces the papal bull, 364; her vigorous measures in regard to the sieges of Alhama, 456;

removal of, to Logrono, ii. 18; her care of troops, 56; her perseverance, 57; her policy towards the nobles, 58; her courtesy to the English Lord Scales, 62; visits the camp, 66; her royal costume, ib.; enforces the laws, 79; chastises certain ecclesiastics, 80; visits the camp before Malaga, 100; establishes her residence at Jaen, 129; her encouragement of her troops before Baza, 135; her reception of the embassy from the Sultan of Egypt, 137; her communication with the army interrupted, 142; energy and patriotic sacrifices of, 143; visits the camp, 145; her popularity and influence, 154; deposes the judges of chancery, 165; animates the troops before Granada, 168; surveys the city of Granada, 169; in danger, from the conflagration of the Christian camp, 171; her favourable disposition towards Columbus, 212; acknowledgments due to, for aiding Columbus, 217; finally consents to the proscription of the Jews, 224; her mistaken piety, 239; alarmed at the attempt made on Ferdinand's life, 243; her early education, 273; her collection of books, 274, 275, n.; her solicitude for the instruction of her children, 275; of her son, Prince John, 277; of the nobles, 278; dissatisfied with the proceedings respecting the succession of females to the crown, 463; her affliction at the loss of her daughter, 464; Mendoza's executor, 472; Ximenes, her confessor, 481; her attempts to reform the religious establishments, 483; offers the see of Toledo to Ximenes, 487; insulted by the general of the Franciscans, 495; consents to the reform by Ximenes, 497; her confidence in Columbus, iii. 8. 15; sends back Indian slaves, 18; sends out the commissioner Bobadilla, 19; declares the Indians free, 25. 44; her zeal for their conversion, 43; sanctions negro slavery, ib.; her benevolent purposes in regard to the Indians defeated, 45; takes no part in the Italian wars, 107; her ill-health, ib. 152. 155. 159; her prediction respecting Charles V, 118; her visit to Joanna, 154; her distress, 155; her illness and fortitude, 152. 155. 237; her exertions for opposing the French invasion, 156; decline of her health, 235. 240. 248; retains her energies, 238; alarm of the nation, 240; particulars of her testament, 241; settles the succession, 242;

Ferdinand named regent by her, 243 ; her codicil, 245 ; her appointment of a commission for the codification of the laws, ib. ; her zeal for the conversion of the Indians, 246 ; her signature to the codicil, 247 ; her resignation and death, 248. 261, n. ; her remains transported to Granada, 249 ; laid in the Alhambra, ib. ; the person of, 250 ; her manners, 251 ; her magnanimity, 253 ; her piety, 254 ; her bigotry, 256. 271 ; her strength of principle, 259 ; her practical sense, 260 ; unwearied activity of, 261 ; her courage, 263 ; her sensibility to her family and friends, 265 ; compared with Elizabeth of England, 267 ; universal homage to her virtues, 273 ; effect of her death on Columbus, 306 ; her treatment of the church, 521 ; her care of the morals of the clergy, 522.

Isabella, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, measures for her union with the Dauphin of France, i. 237 ; with Alphonso, son of the Prince of Portugal, 284 ; accompanies her mother to the camp, ii. 66 ; affianced to Alonso, heir of the Portuguese monarchy, 159. 443 ; escorted to Portugal, 160 ; her attachment to her husband's memory, 445, 447, n. ; her union with Emanuel of Portugal, 455 ; her premature death, 464.

Isabella of Aragon, illustrious and unfortunate, iii. 99, n.

Italian military tactics, ii. 371.

Italy, the school of politics at the close of the fifteenth century, ii. 351 ; her most powerful states, 352 ; character of the politics of, 355 ; its internal prosperity, 356 ; intrigues of Sforza in, 357 ; alarmed at the invasion of Charles VIII, 365 ; military tactics in, 371 ; effects of the news of the league of Venice on, 386 ; influence of the war there, on Spain, 437 ; Louis XII.'s designs on, iii. 59 ; politics of, ib. ; conquests in, 60 ; astonishment of, at the partition of Naples, 76 ; wars there, between the French and Spaniards, 93 ; favours the Spaniards, 94 ; chivalrous character of the war there, 102 ; melancholy condition of, 169 ; views of the states of, 172 ; anxious expectation of, during the battle of the Garigliano, 190 ; invaded by Louis XII, 408 ; abandoned by the French, 420.

J.

Jealousy, the cause of the revolution in Granada, ii. 11.

Jews, retrospective view of, in Spain, i. 348 ; condition of, under the Arabs, 349 ; under the Castilians, 351 ; persecution of, 353. 355. 365 ; legislative enactments respecting, 354 ; their state at the accession of Isabella, 356 ; charges brought against them, 357 ; proofs admitted against, 365 ; excitement against them, ii. 221 ; clergy foment the excitement, ib. ; various offences urged against, 222 ; Torquemada's violent conduct respecting, 223 ; Isabella's feelings towards them, ib. ; edict for their expulsion, 224. 236 ; its severe operation, 225 ; their constancy, 228 ; their departure, 229 ; treatment of them in Portugal, ib. ; their sufferings in Africa, 230 ; in Italy, 231 ; eminent and learned men among the exiled, 233, n. ; whole number of exiled, 234 ; disastrous results of their expulsion, 235 ; motives of the edict, 236 ; contemporary judgments on them elsewhere, 237 ; banished from Portugal, 455 ; prohibited from going to the New World, iii. 35.

Joan, her marriage with John of Aragon, i. 136 ; her deportment towards Carlos, 137. 143 ; is besieged at Estella, 138 ; gives birth to Ferdinand the Catholic, 139 ; forbidden to enter Barcelona, 147 ; seeks refuge in Girona, 154 ; besieges Rosas, and joins Prince Ferdinand before Girona, 162 ; her death, 163.

Joanna, a Portuguese princess, sister of Alphonso V, married to Henry IV. of Castile, i. 173 ; her gaiety—the consequent suspicions, ib. n. ; the mother of Joanna, commonly called Beltraneja, 181 ; to be divorced, 200 ; her death, remarks on her character, 250, n.

Joanna Beltraneja, daughter of Joanna, wife of Henry IV. of Castile, i. 182 ; supported by a fraction of the royal party, 205 ; affianced to the Duke of Guienne, 222 ; Guienne dies, and other negotiations take place, 233 ; foundation of the popular belief of her illegitimacy, 249, n. ; her pretensions to the crown considered, 250 ; partisans of, 256 ; supported by Alphonso of Portugal, 257 ; measures in regard to her marrying him, 259 ; the veil taken by her, 284, 285 ; her proposed marriage with Francis Phoebus, ii. 17 ; further remarks respecting her, 443 ; her death, 444, n. ; the report respecting Ferdinand's proposed union with, iii. 285, n.

Joanna, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, and mother of Charles V, ii. 17 ;

- proposition for the marriage of, with Francis Phœbus, King of Navarre, ib.; her birth, 442, n.; her marriage into the family of Austria, 449. 451; her embarkation, 450; her arrival in Flanders, 451; Charles V. son of, iii. 118; her despondency, 152; birth of her second son, 153; insane, 155. 236; visited by Isabella, 154; her mad conduct, 237; her incapacity, 277; favours the government by her father, 281; rigorously confined, ib.; her condition at the death of her husband, 332; her conduct in regard to her husband's remains, 340; changes her ministers, 343; her interview with Ferdinand, 357; her death, ib. See Philip and Philip and Joanna.
- John II. of Castile, accession of, i. 108; his kingdom governed by favourites, 109; his partiality to Alvaro de Luna, 110, 111; his oppression of the commons, 112; his encouragement of literature, 116; his marriage with the Princess Isabella, 129; his death, 133; his zeal against heretics, 347.
- John II. of Aragon, governs Aragon during the absence of Alphonso V, i. 135; title of his son Carlos to Navarre, ib.; his marriage with Joan Henriquez, 136; her deportment towards Carlos, 137; defeats Carlos, 138; succeeds to the crown of Aragon, 142; his hypocritical reconciliation with Carlos, ib.; his perfidious treatment and imprisonment of him, 144; his escape from the fury of the Catalans, 145; releases his son Carlos from prison, 146; his treaty with Louis XI. of France, 151; allegiance to, renounced by the Catalans, 157; his successes, 158; his distresses, embarrassments, and calamities, 162; death of the wife of, 163; improvement in his affairs, 164; restoration of his eyesight, 165; besieges and subdues Barcelona, 166; his embarrassments at the time of Ferdinand's entrance into Castile, 213; writes to Ferdinand respecting the Archbishop of Toledo, 225; takes part with Roussillon and Cerdagne against Louis XI, 228; throws himself into Perpignan, 229; his animating conduct, 230; relieved by Ferdinand, ib.; Louis detains his ambassadors, 238; his interview with Ferdinand subsequently to the battle of Toro, 281, n.; his death and character, 286.
- John, Duke of Calabria and Lorraine, intrusted with the government of Catalonia, i. 160; abandons the siege of Girona, 163; his popularity and successes, ib.; his death, 165.
- John, Prince, son of Alphonso of Portugal, i. 257; marches to the aid of his father at Zamora, 268; takes part in the battle of Toro, 271, 272; crowned, 280; resigns the crown to his father, ib.; proposition for the union of Alphonso, son of, with Isabella of Castile, 284; discoveries in the reign of, ii. 195; Columbus applies to, 203; his conduct towards the exiled Jews, 229; his reception of Columbus on his return from his first voyage, 247, n.; endeavours to check the career of Spanish discovery, 262; sends an ambassador to Ferdinand and Isabella, 264; his wary diplomacy in regard to their embassy to him, 265; advised of Columbus's having sailed on his second voyage, 266; his disgust, 267; adjustment of the misunderstanding, by the treaty of Tordesillas, 268; dies, and the crown devolves on Emanuel, 445.
- John, son of Ferdinand and Isabella, proposition for the union of, with Catharine of Navarre, ii. 18; measures for the recognition of, 123; honour of knighthood conferred on, 162; his birth and early education, 277. 442, n.; his attainments, 277; Prince of the Asturias, 442, n.; union of, with Margaret, 447. 452, 453; his sudden illness, 456; his death, 457; his amiable character, 458.
- John of Navarre; see Albret.
- Joshua, his miracle of the sun standing still, said to be repeated at Oran, iii. 381, n.
- Judges, abridgment of the commission of the, i. 305, n.
- Juglar, Fray Gaspard, inquisitor over the diocese of Saragossa, ii. 83.
- Julius II, his bull of July 28th, 1508, iii. 40; his election as pope, 180; ratifies the treaty of Cambray, 405; his opposition to the French, 410; grants Ferdinand the investiture of Naples, and other favours, 412; becomes a party in the Holy League, 413; his bull, excommunicating the sovereigns of Navarre, 439.
- Jurisprudence, reform of the, i. 308; study of, in Spain, 314. See Law.
- Justice, administration of, in Castile, i. 240. 289. 299. 304. 317; king and queen preside in courts of, 307; measures for the administration of, ii. 126; Marino cited respecting, iii. 524.
- Justice of Aragon, his court, i. 62; causes referred to, 71 ; institution of the office of, 82 ; important functions of, 83 ; examples of independent conduct of, 85.

K.

King of Aragon, extent of his authority, i. 61.

King of Castile, his power and the people's compared, i. 31.

Knighthood favoured by the law of Castile, i. 39.

Knights, civilities between the Moorish and Christian, i. 410. See Chivalry.

Koran, the, exacts military service of all persons, i. 387, n.

L.

Ladies, literary, in Spain, ii. 284.

Laino, surprised by Gonsalvo, ii. 416.

Lance, complement of a, i. 157, n.

Lanjaron captured, ii. 532.

Laws, codification of the, i. 308 ; compilation of, iii. 536 ; character of the, 544.

Lebrija, Antonio de, notices of, and of his writings, ii. 76, n., 287.

Leo X. furnishes Ximenes with Greek MSS. iii. 397 ; his brief to, 507.

Leon, Ponce de, discovers Florida, iii. 562.

Leon, Rodrigo Ponce de, facts respecting, i. 226. 439 ; his opposition to the Duke of Medina Sidonia, 300. 440 ; made Marquis of Cadiz, 440 ; his expedition against Alhama, 442 ; his indomitable spirit there, 451 ; his connexion with the expedition to the Axarquia, ii. 23, 24. 30 ; his escape, 34 ; rewarded, 58 ; rescues Ferdinand, 92 ; danger of, before Malaga, 102 ; takes possession of the citadel, 114 ; drawn into an ambuscade near Baza, 124 ; clears the gardens of their timber, 136 ; death and heroic character of, 188 ; his descendants and titles, 190, n.

Leonora, Queen of Navarre, ii. 16, iii. 286.

Libraries, remarks on, before the introduction of printing, ii. 274, n.

License for private voyages to the New World, iii. 36.

Literature, early state of, in Castile, i. 116 ; its encouragement under John II, ib. 125 ; Marquis of Villena, 118 ; Marquis of Santillana, 121 ; Juan de Mena, 123 ; minor luminaries, 125 ; epistolary and historical composition at this period, 126 ; encouragement of, by Alhakem II, 400 ; state of, among the Spanish Arabs, 416 ; circumstances favourable to it, 417 ; palmy state of, during the reign of the sovereigns, iii. 575 ; n. ; further observations respecting it, 586, n. See Castilian literature.

Llorente, Don Juan Antonio, his computations respecting the victims of the Inquisition, i. 380 ; notice of his History of the Inquisition, 384, n. ; computations respecting the Inquisition, taken from, iii. 585, n.

Loja, Ferdinand's unsuccessful attempt on, ii. 4 ; Ali Atar, the defender of, 38 ; Lord Scales distinguishes himself at, 62.

Lombardy conquered by the French, iii. 60.

Longfellow, Henry W. his version of Manrique's Coplas, ii. 322, n.

Longueville strengthened by Palice, and pursues the Duke of Alva, iii. 433.

Lorraine, Duke of ; see John.

Louis XI. of France, his treaty with John II. of Aragon, i. 156 ; his interview with Henry IV. of Castile, on the banks of the Bidassoa, 179 ; the consequences, 180 ; his proposition respecting the union of his brother and Joanna, 222 ; Roussillon and Cerdagne revolt from, 228 ; treaty of, with the King of Aragon, 231 ; detains ambassadors of John II, 238 ; the first monarch to extend an interest to European politics, ii. 15 ; his standing in regard to Navarre, 17, 18 ; succeeded by Charles VIII, 358.

Louis XII, his designs on Italy, iii. 59 ; his negotiations with various European powers, 60 ; openly menaces Naples, 64. 75 ; his rupture with Ferdinand, 90 ; crosses the Alps, 96 ; negotiates a treaty with Philip at Lyons, 126 ; demands an explanation of the archduke, 146 ; his indignation, and measures for invading Spain, 156 ; his great preparations against Italy, 176 ; his chagrin after the rout of Garigliano, 213 ; his treatment of the garrison of Gaeta, 214 ; his apprehensions for the fate of his possessions in the north of Italy, 219 ; his treaty with Ferdinand, 220 ; causes of his failure in Italy, 223 ; memoirs of the period of, 231, n. ; his policy respecting the misunderstanding between Ferdinand and Philip, 285 ; his brilliant interview with Ferdinand at Savona, 352 ; his compliments to Gonsalvo, 354 ; his projects against Venice, 405 ; his partition of the continental possessions of Venice with Maximilian, ib. ; crosses the Alps and invades Italy, 408 ; his aggressions on the church, 411 ; his treaty with Navarre, 429 ; his truce with Ferdinand, 435.

Lucena, battle of, ii. 40.

Lucero, an inquisitor, iii. 320, n.

Lugo, Alvarez Yanez de, justice executed on, i. 302 ; Isabella refuses to pardon, iii. 259, n.

Luna, Alvaro de, rise and character of, i. 109 ; a favourite of John II. of Castile, 110 ; viewed with jealousy by the nobles, 111 ; his influence in the oppression of the commons, 112 ; the "Chronicle" of, 127, n. ; his decline, ib. ; his influence in relation to the marriage of John II, and its consequences, 129 ; his fall, ib. ; his death, 130 ; lamented by John, 132.

Lyons, the treaty of, iii. 127 ; rejected by Ferdinand, 147 ; treaty of, in 1504, 221.

Lyric poetry, low state of, in Castile, ii. 321.

M.

Machiavelli, Florentine minister at the papal court, iii. 190.

Madrid, becomes the seat of government, ii. 14, iii. 488 ; account of the environs of, 550, n.

Magnet, discovery of the polarity of the, ii. 195, n.

Mahometanism, remarks on, i. 386.

Malaga, descent on the environs of, ii. 21 ; description of, 93 ; expedition against, 94 ; sharp rencontre before, 97 ; invested by sea and land, 98 ; the brilliant spectacle of, 99 ; summoned to surrender, 101 ; distresses in, 105. 109 ; general sally from, 107 ; outworks carried, 109 ; proposals for surrendering, 111 ; surrenders, 113 ; taken possession of, 114, 115 ; purification of, 114 ; release of Christian captives at, 115 ; lament of the inhabitants of, 117 ; sentence passed on them, 118 ; wary device of Ferdinand respecting the plate found there, 119 ; cruel policy of the victors, 120 ; measures for re peopling, 121.

Manrique, Jorge, his "Coplas," ii. 322 ; translated by Longfellow, ib. n.

Mantua, Marquis of, appointed commander of the French army, iii. 180 ; his attack on Rocca Secca, 184 ; builds a bridge across the Garigliano, and passes over, 186 ; resumes his quarters, 189 ; situation of the army under, 195 ; their insubordination, ib. ;

his resignation, 196 ; succeeded by Saluzzo, ib.

Manuel, Juan, ambassador at the court of Maximilian, iii. 279 ; his character, ib. ; his ascendancy over Philip, 294 ; estates and honours lavished on, 319 ; his flight to the court of Maximilian, 361.

Manufactures in Spain, i. 398 ; laws respecting, iii. 546 ; extent of the finer, 548.

Manuscripts, Greek, furnished to Ximenes by the pope, iii. 397 ; their value, and destruction, 400.

Marchena ; see Perez.

Margaret, daughter of Maximilian, her union with Prince John, ii. 447. 452, 453 ; incidents in the early life of, 452 ; her voyage to Spain, and reception there, 453.

Maria, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, her birth, ii. 442, n.

Marina, notice of his works, i. 48, n.

Marinæo, Lucio, an eminent scholar in Spain, ii. 281 ; notice of his writings, ib. n. ; cited respecting the administration of justice, iii. 524.

Martel, Jerome, public historiographer, i. 103, n.

Martyr, Peter, d'Anghiera, notice of him and his works, ii. 155, n. ; iii. 56, n. ; his allusions to Columbus, 216. 253 ; invited to the court to open a school for the young nobility, 280 ; his labours, 281 ; cited respecting Isabella's sickness and death, iii. 238, 239. 249.

Masterships, grand, annexed to the crown, i. 329, 330.

Maximilian, his embassy to Ferdinand and Isabella, ii. 126 ; negotiations of the Spanish court with, iii. 64 ; his truce with the King of France, ib. ; partial to Spain, 175 ; tampers with Gonsalvo de Cordova, 281 ; shares the possession of Venice with Louis XII, 405.

Mazarquivir, captured, iii. 373 ; Ximenes's expedition arrives at, 376.

Mechlin, treaty of, iii. 436, n.

Medina, commercial importance of, iii. 572.

Mena, John de, a distinguished poet in the reign of John II, i. 123 ; his influence on Castilian poetry, 124.

Mendana, Pedro de, his grievous devastations, i. 290.

Mendoza, Diego Hurtado de, facts respecting, i. 186, n. ; Marquis of Santillana, 226 ; addresses a remonstrance to the king and queen respecting the Hermenda1, 317 ; his magnificent train, ii. 64 ; his bravery, 65 ; opposed to Ximenes, iii. 494.

- Mendoza, Diego de, his rout of the French rear-guard near Barleta, iii. 110.
- Mendoza, Inigo Lopez de, Marquis of Santillana, an illustrious wit of the reign of John II, i. 121; his death, 123.
- Mendoza, Inigo Lopez de; see Tendilla.
- Mendoza, Pedro Gonzales de, Archbishop of Seville and Cardinal of Spain, favours Isabella, i. 234; his bravery at the battle of Toro, 273; accompanies Isabella to suppress the tumults at Segovia, 295; prevails on Ferdinand and Isabella to open negotiations with the court of Rome, 334; favours the Jews, 363; the successor of Carillo, Archbishop of Toledo, ii. 14; sent forward to take possession of the Alhambra, at the capitulation of Granada, 174. 177; favours the project of Columbus, 206; his death, 468; his early life, 469; his character, 470; his amours, 471; the queen his executor, 472; names Ximenes as his successor, 473.
- Mendoza, Salazar de, justifies Ferdinand's treatment of Navarre, iii. 438, n.
- Merlo, Diego de, his expedition against Alhama, i. 438, 439. 441.
- Metals, erroneous policy in regard to, i. 338; in the West Indies, iii. 47. 568.
- Miguel, son of Emanuel of Portugal and Isabella, his birth, ii. 465; his recognition as heir to the throne, 466; his death, 467.
- Milan conquered by the French, iii. 61. 175.
- Military Orders of Castile, i. 321; order of St. Jago, of Compostella, 323; of Calatrava, 325. 327; of Alcantara, 326. 328; their reformation, 330.
- Military service, exacted by the Koran, i. 387; remarks on, iii. 224; Gonsalvo's reform of the, 225.
- Military tactics in Italy, ii. 371.
- Militia, discipline of the, ii. 60; organization of, 439.
- Mineral wealth of Spain, i. 397.
- Ministers, resident, first maintained at foreign courts by Ferdinand the Catholic, ii. 15.
- Minturnæ, the ancient city of, iii. 184, n.
- Miracle of the sun standing still, at the storming of Oran, iii. 381, n.
- Moclin, meeting of Ferdinand and Isabella in the camp before, ii. 66.
- Modern Inquisition, turned against the Jews, i. 358; authorized in Castile, 362; put into operation at Seville, 364; its sanguinary character, 366; its final organization, 369; forms of trial by the, 370; torture, 372; its injustice, 374; the autos da fe, 375; convictions under Torquemada, 379; particulars respecting its introduction into Aragon, ii. 82; remonstrance of the cortes, 84; conspiracy, 85; assassination of Arbues, ib.; cruel persecutions, 86; established throughout Ferdinand's dominions, 87; remarks on its establishment in Spain, iii. 257; 583; subsequent troubles from the, 320; Ferdinand's conduct in regard to the, in Aragon, 474, n.; effects of the, 585; number of victims of the, ib. n. See Ancient Inquisition.
- Mola di Gaeta, action at the bridge of, iii. 205.
- Moldenhawer, Professor, his visit to Alcalá, respecting the manuscripts used in the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 401, n.
- Molucca Islands, congress respecting the, ii. 270, n.
- Monasteries, their corrupt state, ii. 482; attempts at reform in, 484. 494.
- Monastic orders, Ximenes attempts to reform the, ii. 494; great excitement among them, ib.
- Montalvo, Alfonso Diaz de, his work, entitled "Ordenanças Reales," i. 310; author of other works, iii. 537, n.
- Montilla, demolition of castle of, iii. 363.
- Montpensier, Duke of, left as viceroy of Charles XII. at Naples, ii. 395; his disasters there, 409; besieged at Atella, 413; his capitulation, 421; death, 422.
- Moorish minstrelsy, ii. 306; its date, 312; its high repute, 313.
- Moorz, religious toleration of the, i. 6; their refinements and attainments, 15; crusade against, under Henry IV. of Castile, 171; papal indulgences for the prosecution of the war against them, 175; their deportment towards the Jews, 349; their conquest of Spain, 388; their policy towards the conquered, 390; their intermarriages, ib.; checked by the defeat at Tours, 391; their form of government, 392; character and education of their sovereigns, 393; their military establishment, 394; sumptuous public works of the, 395; husbandry and manufactures among them, 398; their high civilization and prosperity, 400; their literature under Alhakem II, 401; intellectual developement among them, 402; Contraction of their dominion, 404; reciprocal civilities between them and the Spaniards, 409; their gallantry, 410; their ballads or romances, 411. 424; their chivalrous character, 412; their successful resistance in Granada, 414 ; literature of the, 416 ; their historical merits, 421 ; their useful discoveries, 422 ; impulse given by them to Europe, 423 ; their elegant literature, 424 ; poetical character of the, 426 ; their influence on Castilian literature, 427 ; circumstances prejudicial to their literary reputation, 429 ; surprise Zahara, 436 ; their reception of the Spanish at Alhama, 444 ; besiege Alhama, 449. 455 ; withdraw, 453 ; skirmish with the Spaniards before Loja, ii. 4 ; internal dissensions among the, in Granada, 11 ; their opposition to the Christians in the expedition to the Axarquia, 25 ; their losses at the battle of Lucena, 42 ; strength of their fortresses, 49 ; their modes of defence, ib. ; terms to the vanquished, 54 ; policy in fomenting the factions among them, 71 ; success and advancement of the Christians against, 74 ; their civil feuds at the siege of Malaga, 102 ; general sally of the, 108 ; termination of their empire in the Peninsula, 183 ; their destiny, 187 ; Talavera's mild policy for the conversion of, 509 ; books of the, burnt, 516 ; revolt in the Albaycin, 519 ; conversion of, at Granada, 525 ; called Moriscoes, ib. ; rising of the, in the Alpuxarras, 529 ; their punishment, 533 ; measures for introducing Christianity among them, 534, 558 ; transported to the Barbary coast, 547 ; edict against those in Castile, 551 ; termination of their history, during the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, 561 ; prohibited from going to the New World, iii. 35 ; expedition against, in Africa, under Ximenes, 372 ; their loss at Oran, 380. See Granada.

Moral energy, remarks on, ii. 503.

Moratin, his "Origenes del Teatro Espanol," ii. 342, n.

Moriscoes, the Moors so called, ii. 526 ; Gonsalvo's kindness to them, iii. 368.

Moya, Marchioness of ; see Bobadilla.

Munoz, Juan Bautista, notice of him and his writings, iii. 57, n.

N.

Naharro, Bartholomeo Torres de, notice of him, ii. 331 ; his comedies, 332.

Najara, Duke of, dissatisfied with the queen's settlement of the regency, iii. 278 ; surrenders, 361 ; arrives at Pampelona with reinforcements, 434.

Names, Arabian mode of selecting, ii. 13, n.

Naples, dissatisfactions respecting the crown of, ii. 367 ; threatened by Louis XII, iii. 64 ; partition of, between France and Spain, 66. 68. 75 ; ground of Ferdinand's claim to, 68 : astonishment of Italy at the partition of, 76 ; French forces there, 96 ; submission of, to the Spanish, 140 ; Gonsalvo's triumphant entry into, 141 ; princes of, ib. n. ; reduction of the fortresses of, 142 ; enthusiasm for Gonsalvo at, 216 ; extortions of the Spanish troops there, 218 ; treaty respecting, 287 ; enthusiastic reception of Ferdinand at, 335 ; dissatisfactions there, 338 ; Ferdinand's acts there, 348 ; Gonsalvo leaves, 351 ; the pope grants the investiture of, to Ferdinand, 412 ; government of, 557 ; regard there for Ferdinand, 558. See Charles VIII, and Garigliano.

Navagiero, Andrea, his account of the revenues of the nobles in Castile, iii. 519, n. ; cited respecting chivalry in the war of Granada, 580 ; notice of him and his works, 581, n.

Navarre, in the middle of the fifteenth century, i. 2 ; title of Carlos to, 135 ; factions of the Beaumonts and Agramonts, 137 ; defeat of Carlos, 138 ; influence of Louis XI. in the councils of ; crown of, devolves on Francis Phoebus, ii. 16 ; marriage of Catharine of, 81 ; sovereigns of, iii. 425 ; Ferdinand's distrust of, 426 ; negotiations of, with France, ib. ; Ferdinand demands a passage through, for his army, 428. 441 ; embarrassing situation of the princes of, 428 ; allied to France, ib. ; invaded by the Duke of Alva, 430 ; abandoned by John, ib. ; conquered, 431 ; united with Castile, 437. 556 ; examination of Ferdinand's conduct respecting the treatment of, 438 ; excommunication of the sovereigns of, by Julius II, 439 ; imprudence of, in not granting Ferdinand's request, 444 ; authorises war, ib. ; abuse of the victory over, ib. ; authorities respecting, 445, n. ; French defeated by a force sent there by Ximenes, 491.

Navarrete, Martin Fernandez de, his researches in the public archives of Spain, ii. 218. iii. 57, n.

Navarro, Pedro, his celebrity, iii. 73 ; defends Canosa, 100 ; his services at Naples, 143 ; joins Gonsalvo, 182 ; commander of the expedition against Oran, 374. 377 ; sends for the Cardinal to take possession of Oran, 381 ; his opposition to Ximenes, 383 ; his African conquests, 387 ; his fate, 388, n. ; his conduct at the battle of Ravenna, 415.

Navigation, remarks respecting, ii. 195.

Negroes, slavery of the, sanctioned, iii. 43. See Indians.

- Nemours, Duke of, supersedes D'Aubigny, iii. 96 ; invests Barleta, 100 ; defies the Spaniards, 109 ; discomfited, 111 ; his expedition to Castellaneta, 115 ; fights the Spanish at Cerignola, 132 ; his forces, 133 ; his death, 135 ; rout of the French, 136 ; his burial, 140. See Foir.
- New World, historians of the, iii. 55, n. ; Inquisition extended to the, 492.
- Nobles of Castile, privileges and immunities of the, i. 33 ; their jealousy of Alvaro de Luna, 111 ; their league against Henry IV. of Castile, 181 ; oppose the Santa Hermandad, 293 ; plans for reducing, 311 ; policy of the sovereigns towards the, ii. 58 ; magnificence of the, 64 ; their gallantry, 65 ; the queen's care for the education of the, 278 ; their scholarship, 283 ; accomplished women, 284 ; dissatisfied with the queen's settlement of the regency, iii. 278 ; their disgust with Ferdinand's severity in the case of the Marquis of Priego, 363 ; their feelings at the death of Ferdinand, 468 ; Ximenes replies to, 489 ; depression of, by Ferdinand and Isabella, at their accession, 515 ; their great power, 519 ; their immense revenues, ib. n.
- Northmen, remarks on the discoveries by the, ii. 202. n. ; 215, n.
- Novara, battle of, iii. 421.
- Noyon, treaty of, iii. 496.
- Nunez, employed on the compilation of the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399, n.
- O.
- Oliva, Fernan Perez de, notice of, ii. 337 ; his classical imitations, 339 ; not popular, ib.
- Olmedo, battles of, i. 193.
- Omeiades, dynasty of the, i. 391. 393 ; public works by the, 394 ; their revenues, 397 ; their decay, 403. 409, 417.
- Oran, description of, iii. 373 ; warlike preparations against, 374 ; battle before, 378 ; the city of, stormed, 379 ; entered by the army, 380 ; Moorish loss at, 381 ; entered by Ximenes, ib. ; miracle said to have been performed there, ib. n. ; Ximenes said to continue to watch over, 390, n. ; earthquake at, in 1790, and abandoned, ib. n.
- Ordenanças Reales, the work of Montalvo, i. 310 ; iii. 535,
- Orders ; see Military Orders.
- Ortega, Juan de, scales the battlements of Alhama, i. 442.
- Orthès, treaty of, iii. 436.
- Ostia, the storming and capture of, ii. 430.
- Ovando, Nicholas de, sent out to Hispaniola, iii. 24 ; instructions to, 25 ; refuses Columbus admittance to Hispaniola, 31 ; sends Bobadilla and others to Spain, 32.
- Oviedo y Valdez, Gonzalo Fernandez de, author of the "Quincuagenas," facts respecting, i. 220, n. ; character of his work, 221.
- P.
- Pacheco, Juan, Marquis of Villena ; see Villena.
- Pacific Ocean, its discovery, and the effect thereof on Spain, iii. 562.
- Palencia, Alonzo de, notice of, i. 244.
- Palencia repurchases its ancient right of representation, i. 114, n.
- Palice, Sire de la, iii. 97 ; at Canosa, 100 ; his brave defence of Ruvo, 113 ; made prisoner, 114 ; treatment of, 115 ; commands the French retreat from Italy, 420 ; strengthens Longueville, 433.
- Palos, Columbus sails from, ii. 214 ; reception of Columbus at, on his return from his first voyage, 248.
- Pampelona, the Duke of Alva retreats to, iii. 434 ; besieged, ib.
- Papal indulgences ; see Indulgences.
- Paredes, Diego de, heroism of, iii. 197.
- Pearl-fisheries, returns from the, iii. 559. 560, n.
- Pedro, constable of Portugal, crown of Catalonia offered to, i. 158 ; his death, 159.
- Pena de los Enamorados, origin of its name, ii. 10, n.
- Perez, Fray Juan de Marchena, guardian of the convent of La Rabida, his interest and exertions in behalf of Columbus, ii. 204. 208.
- Perpignan, gallant defence of, i. 231 ; siege and reduction of, by the French, 241.
- Pesaro, a Venetian admiral, storms St. George, iii. 73.
- Peschiera, Louis XII. hangs the governor of, and his son, iii. 408.
- Peter IV. prepares laws for the discipline of the navy, i. 60 ; defeats the army of the Union, at Epila, 69 ; his magnanimous policy, 70.
- Philip, Archduke, son of Maximilian, union of, with Joanna, ii. 447. 451 ; his claims to the crown of Castile, after the death of Prince John, 460 ; Charles V. son of, iii. 118 ; his visit to Spain with Joanna, 119 ; reception of, at the French court, 120. 126 ; in Spain, 121 ; recognised by the cortes, ib. ; his discontent, 123 ; leaves Spain for France, 125 ; negotiates a treaty with Louis XII. 126 ; Louis XII. demands an explanation of him, 146 ; his treatment of Joanna, 237. 317 ; his pretensions to supremacy in

- Castile, 279; increase of his party, 280; tampers with Gonsalvo, 281; lands at Coruna, and is joined by the nobles, 293; Martyr's account of his character, 295; avoids Ferdinand, ib.; his interviews with Ferdinand, 297. 303; his arbitrary government, 318; refers the affairs of the Inquisition to the royal council, 321; his death, 327; his character, 328; his remains moved to Granada, 340. 357, 358, n.
- Philip II. claims the Portuguese crown, iii. 579, n.
- Philip and Joanna, the accession of, iii. 276; embark for Spain, and arrive in England, 291; arrive at Coruna, 293; sovereignty of Castile surrendered to, 301; proceed to Valladolid, 317; style of living at the court of, 319.
- Phœbus, Francis, the crown of Navarre devolves on, ii. 16; proposition for the union of, with Joanna, the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, 17; his sudden death, ib.; iii. 424.
- Pinciano; see Nunez.
- Pisa, France and Spain withdraw their protection from, iii. 408.
- Pius III. elected pope, iii. 180; death, ib.
- Plague, its ravages in Castile, i. 336; at Seville, 367.
- Poetry, Castilian, i. 116; premium for, at Seville, 126; Hebrew, 351; Moorish, 424; ii. 306; subsequent Castilian, 306; developement of the Castilian, and further remarks, iii. 586, n.
- Poison put upon arrows by Moors, ii. 53.
- Polygamy, the cause of the revolution in Granada, ii. 11.
- Polyglot Bible, Ximenes's edition of the, ii. 290, n. 292; iii. 386; account of it, 397; difficulties of the task, 399; scholars employed in its compilation, 399, n.; its merits, 401; destruction of the manuscripts which formed the basis of it, 401.
- Pope, difference of the crown with the, i. 333; makes a grant to Ferdinand and Isabella, ii. 20. See Alexander VI, Julius II, Leo X, Pius III, and Sixtus IV.
- Population, augmentation of, in Spain, iii. 576; census of, in Castile, ib. n.; mode of estimating it, ib.
- Portugal, treaty of peace between Castile and, i. 283; application of Columbus to the King of, ii. 203; treatment of the Jews in, 229. 237, n.; Jews banished from, ib.; King and Queen of, visit Spain, 460; Philip II.'s claim to crown of, iii. 579, n. See Alphonso.
- Portuguese, maritime enterprise of the, ii. 195; jealous of the Spanish maritime enterprise, 262.
- Pragmáticas, issued, i. 112; iii. 521; frequency of, in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, 527, n.; collected and published, 535.
- Press, censorship of, established, ii. 297.
- Priego; see Cordova, Pedro de.
- Printing, introduction of, into Spain, ii. 294; the queen encourages it, ib.; its rapid diffusion, 295; frequency of presses for, iii. 574.
- Provençale literature, revives in Aragon, i. 97; flourishes in Valencia, 101; writers there, ib.; abandoned, 102.
- Pulci, the Florentine poet, cited respecting land in the West, ii. 201.
- Pulgar, Fernando del, his account of the Swiss mercenaries, ii. 61 remarks respecting him, 75, n.
- Purgatory, exemption from, by papal bulls, i. 175, n.
- Q.
- Quincuagenas, account of this curious manuscript, i. 220, n.
- Quintanilla, his life of Ximenes, ii. 501.
- R.
- Rank, not a passport to honour, i. 312.
- Ravenna, battle of, iii. 414; its effects, 419.
- Ravensstein, iii. 78; shipwrecked, 83.
- Redondilla, remark on the, ii. 310, n.
- Reduan Benegas, ii. 26. 34.
- Reform, of the monasteries, ii. 484; in the diocese of Ximenes, 492; of the monastic orders, 493; great excitement caused by it, 494; visit of the Franciscan general, who insults the queen, 495; the pope's interference, and the queen's consent to a reform, 497; its operation and effects, 498.
- René le Bon, of Anjou, crown of Catalonia offered to, i. 160.
- Repartimientos, the system of, iii. 563.
- Revenues derived from the West Indies, iii. 559. 572; augmentation of the, 574.
- Richelieu, Cardinal, his declaration on his death-bed, ii. 496; parallel between him and Ximenes, 510.
- Riol, Santiago Agustín, on the various tribunals under Ferdinand and Isabella, iii. 539, n.
- Rivers, Earl of, from Britain; see Scales.
- Robertson, William, i. 56, n.; on the genuineness of Isabella's testament, iii. 279, n.; on Ferdinand's intention to oppose Philip's landing, 283, n.; on Ferdinand's proposed union with Joanna Beltraneja, 285, n.; on the queen's exaction of an oath from Ferdinand that he would not marry a second time, 293, n.; his bias respecting Ferdinand's transactions with Philip, 304, n.; on Ximenes's objection to slavery, 491, n.

- Roderic, King of the Goths, fatal battle of, i. 389.
- Roger, Ponce, a reconciled heretic, his punishment, i. 347, n.
- Roman Catholic; see Church.
- Romances of chivalry, ii. 301; their evil effects, 304.
- Rome, perfidious policy of, in regard to dispensations, i. 382; see Church and Pope.
- Ronda, prisoners taken at, liberated, ii. 70; Hamet Zeli, the defender of, 94; rendezvous at, 537. 545.
- Roussillon, pledged to the French king, i. 156; revolt there, 228; second French invasion of, 238; siege and reduction of, 241; perfidy of Louis XI, 242; negotiations respecting, ii. 361; restored to Aragon, 364; invaded by the French, iii. 158.
- Ruvo, captured, iii. 113; the important consequences, 116.
- S.
- St. Angel, Louis de, intercedes with Isabella for Columbus, ii. 211.
- St. Dominic, remarks on, i. 345, n.; act of, for a penitent heretic, 347, n.
- St. George, the storming of, iii. 72.
- St. James, grand master of, i. 222; military order of, 323; see Villena and Cardenas.
- Salamanca, literary character of, ii. 291; the concord of, iii. 290. 294; university of, 402. 574.
- Salsas, siege of, iii. 158.
- Saluzzo, Marquis of, sent to the relief of Gaeta, iii. 176. 181; succeeds the Marquis of Mantua as commander of the French army in Italy, 196; his retreat to Gaeta, 204; routed, 208; fate of the army under, 214; his death, 215.
- San Germano, Gonsalvo takes post at, iii. 183.
- Santa Fe, history of the origin of, ii. 173.
- Santa Hermandad, re-organization of the, i. 290. See Hermandad.
- Santillana, Inigo Lopez de Mendoza, Marquis of, an illustrious wit of the reign of John II, i. 121; his death, 123, n.; 186, n.; cited, 131, n.
- Saracen invasion of Spain, i. 1. 9.
- Saragossa, Autos da fe celebrated at, ii. 84; visited by the sovereigns, 123.
- Savona, brilliant interview of Ferdinand and Louis XII. at, iii. 352.
- Scales, Lord, aids the Spanish sovereigns, ii. 62; the queen's courtesy to, 63; his costume at the meeting of Ferdinand and Isabella before Moclin, 67; loses his life, 127, n.
- Scott, Sir Walter, his representation of René's character, i. 160, n.; of Rebecca and Isaac, 353, n.
- Sculptors in Spain, iii. 574, n.
- Segovia, interview there, between Henry IV. and Isabella, i. 235; Isabella proclaimed queen there, 251; tumult at, suppressed by Isabella, 295.
- Seminara, the march against, ii. 402; battle of, 405.
- Sempere, critical notice of, i. 57.
- Seville, the corporation of, offer premiums for poetry, i. 126; reception of Isabella there, 298; Inquisition at, 364; prevalence of the plague at, 367; reception of Columbus at, ii. 250; colonial trade confined to, iii. 42; heretics burned there, 585, n. See Mendoza.
- Sforza, Lodovico, intrigues of, ii. 357; his proposal to the King of France, ib.; jealous of the French, 376. 383; unpopularity of, iii. 59; his fate, 61.
- Sheep, in Castile, i. 30, n.
- Sidonia, Medina, the Duke of, head of the Guzmans, i. 227; a supporter of Isabella, 300; marches to relieve Alhama, 452; to Malaga, ii. 106; death of, 188, n.; application made to, by Columbus, 207; his income, iii. 519, n.
- Sierra Vermeja, revolt of the, ii. 535; expedition into the, 537; Spaniards routed there, 544; submission of, 546; fate of the inhabitants of, ib.; ballads thereon, 547; melancholy reminiscences respecting, 549.
- Silva, Alonso de, sent by Ferdinand to the French court, ii. 368; Charles's dissatisfaction with him, 370; opens a correspondence with Sforza, 376.
- Silva, Juan de, Count of Cifuentes, his connexion with the expedition to Axarquía, ii. 22.
- Silveira, Fernando de, representative of the Prince of Portugal at the affiancing with the Infanta Isabella, ii. 159.
- Sismondi, remarks on his writings, ii. 426, n.
- Sixtus IV, the sovereigns of Castile differ with, i. 332; sends a legate to the court of Castile, 334; grants a bull, authorizing the Inquisition in Castile, 362; his conduct, 368; his present of a cross to the sovereigns, ii. 69.
- Slaves, condition of the Visigothic, i. 4; regular exchange of, recommended by Columbus, iii. 16; Isabella's proceedings in regard to, 17. 43; sent back, 18; introduction of, into the New World, 44; in the colonies, 564.
- Slidell, his remarks on the armour of Ferdinand and Isabella, ii. 68, n.; his description of Toledo, iii. 572, n.
- Solis, invited to court, iii. 559; his discoveries, 562.
- Sos, in Aragon, the birth-place of Ferdinand the Catholic, i. 139.

Soto, Ferdinand de, his discoveries and death, iii. 559, n.
 Sotomayor, Alonso de, his duel with Bayard, iii. 104.
 Sousa first gains the summit of the walls of Oran, iii. 380.
 South Sea, effect of its discovery, iii. 562.
 Spain, i. 1; consolidation of the various states of, 2; number of states in, reduced to four, ib.; influence of the Visigoths on, 4; of the Saracen invasion on, 5; of the ecclesiastics there, 11; state of the Jews in, at the accession of Isabella, 356; early successes of Mahometanism and the Arabs in, 386; conquest of, 388; treatment of Christians in, 390; mineral wealth of, 397; civilities between the people of, and the Spanish Arabs, 409; merits of the scholars of, ii. 289; universities of, 291; introduction of printing into, 294; encouraged by the queen, 295; its rapid diffusion, 297; importance of the treaty of Barcelona to, 363; alarmed at the expedition of Charles VIII. into Italy, 362; peace of, with France, 434; influence of the Italian wars on, 437; moral consequences of her discoveries in the West, iii. 51; her geographical extent, 53; neutrality of, secured in relation to France and Italy, 60; alarmed by the French conquests in Italy, 61; rupture of, with France, 90; invasion of, by Louis XII, 157; effects of the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella on, 514; policy of the crown at their accession, 515; depression of the nobles in, 516; treatment of the church in, 521; morals there, 522; state of the commons in, 523; royal ordinances for, 527; advancement of prerogative in, 533; legal compilations there, 536; organization of councils in, 538; legal profession in, advanced, 540; character of the laws during the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, 544; erroneous principles of legislation in, 545; principal exports from, 547; manufactures, 548; agriculture, 549; economical policy in, 552; internal improvements in, 554; increase of the empire of, 556; its government of Naples, 557; its revenues from the Indies, 559; spirit of adventure in, 560; progress of discovery, 561; effect produced there, by the discovery of the South Sea, 562; slavery in her colonies, 564; administration of laws in the colonies of, 567; its general prosperity, 569; opulence of the towns of, 571; public embellishments in, 571; augmentation of its revenue, 572; of its population, 576; patriotic principle in, 579; spirit of bigotry in, 583; beneficent impulse there, 584; the period of national glory for, 588. See Castile.

Spaniards, their gradual encroachment on the Saracens, i. 9; dissensions among them, 10; extend their conquests to the Douro and Tagus, 11; their religious fervour and fanaticism, 12; their traditional minstrelsy, 13; their respect for the Mahometans, 15; early discoveries by the, ii. 196; their progress of discovery, iii. 563; excesses, 564; their patriotic principle, 579. See Castile.

Spanish Arabs; see Moors.

Spanish fleet, fitted out under Gonsalvo de Cordova, iii. 67.

Stage, low condition of the, ii. 336.

Sugar-cane introduced into Hispaniola from the Canaries, iii. 559.

Swiss mercenaries, Pulgar's account of the, ii. 61; employment of, 186; their value in the expedition of Charles VIII, 373; their organization, 374.

T.

Talavera, Fray Fernando de, anecdote respecting him and Isabella, i. 360; regards Columbus's theory as visionary, ii. 205; opposes the demands of Columbus, 211; Archbishop of Granada, 506; remarks respecting, 507, 508; his mild policy, 509; the clergy dissatisfied with it, 510; appeases the insurgents of the Albaycin, 521; commends Ximenes, 527; the queen's correspondence with, iii. 256, n.; a victim of the Inquisition, 257, n.

Tarento, invested by Gonsalvo de Cordova, iii. 82; surrenders, 87.

Tendilla, Inigo Lopez de Mendoza, Count of, remarks respecting, ii. 506; his conduct at the Albaycin, 520; his income, iii. 520, n.

Ticknor, George, his essay on the early progress of the dramatic and the histrionic art in Spain, ii. 341, n.

Time, economy of, by Ximenes, iii. 508.

Toledo, account of environs of, iii. 550, n.

Toledo, wealth and grandeur of the archbishop of, i. 44; iii. 521, n. See Carrillo, Mendoza, and Ximenes.

Toledo, Fadrique de; see Alva.

Toledo, Garcia de, loses his life, iii. 388, n.

Toleration, among the Moors, i. 6; remarks on the want of, ii. 554. See Intolerance.

Tordesillas, treaty of, ii. 268.

Toro, battle of, i. 271; meeting of the assembly at, in 1505, iii. 276.

Toro, Leyes de, iii. 536.

Torquemada, Thomas de, the confessor of Isabella, facts respecting, i. 361; Inquisitor-general of Castile and Aragon, 369; convictions under, 379; his last days and death, 382; his fanaticism, 383; his violent conduct at a Jewish negotiation with Ferdinand and Isabella, ii. 223; forbids the Jews receiving assistance, 229.

Torture by the Inquisition, i. 372.

Tournament near Trani, iii. 102.

Trade, regulations of, i. 335, iii. 541.

Trani, tournament near, iii. 102.

Trastamara, revolution of, i. 107; termination of male line of the house of, 245.

Tribunals of Castile, reorganization of the, i. 306.

Tripoli captured, iii. 388.

Truxillo, punishment of certain ecclesiastics there, ii. 80.

Turks, Frederic's application to, for aid, iii. 65; Gonsalvo's expedition against, 72; their defence of St. George, 73.

U.

Universities, Spanish, ii. 291; iii. 390. 402. 574.

Urena, Count of, ii. 538; his conduct at the Sierra Vermeja, 540, 541. 544; goes out to meet Gonsalvo, iii. 365; comes into collision with Ximenes, 494.

V.

Valadata, intellectual character of, i. 403, n.

Valencia, conquered by Aragon, i. 59; loans by the city of, ii. 143; printing press at, in 1474, 296.

Vega, Garcilasso de la, rescues Ferdinand, ii. 92; notice of, 96, n.; minister of Ferdinand, 376; aids Gonsalvo at the storming of Ostia, 430; his boldness towards the pope, iii. 63; Ferdinand's deportment towards him, 298, 346.

Vega, Lorenzo Suarez de la, his negotiations, iii. 63; his ability, 173, n.

Velasco, Bernardino de, grand constable, iii. 364; proposed union of, with Elvira, 366; facts respecting, ib. n.; his income, 519, n.

Velez Malaga, position of, ii. 89; its surrender, 92.

Velilla, prophetic tintinnabulations of the miraculous bell of, iii. 461, n.

Venereal disease, origin of the, iii. 49.

Venice, the celebrated league of, ii. 384; aids France against Milan, iii. 59; Ferdinand's negotiations with, 63; her distrust of France, 173; projects against, 405; partition of, by the treaty of Cambray, ib.; power of, broken by the battle of Agnadel, 409; continental provinces of, released from their allegiance, ib.; becomes a party in the Holy League, 412; disgusted, 420; her definitive treaty with France for their mutual defence, 421; laid waste by Cardona, ib.; Daru's history of, 423, n.

Vergara, Juan de, employed in the compilation of Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399, n.; epitaph on Ximenes, 501, n.

Vespucci, Amerigo, iii. 29, n.; gives the name to the western continent, iii. 560.

Viana, Prince of. See Carlos.

Vicenza, cruelties at capture of, iii. 418, n.

Villafrata, destroyed by Ximenes, iii. 494.

Villena, Henry, marquis of, his literary character, i. 118; fate of his library, 120, 381, n.

Villena, Juan Pacheco, marquis of, character and influence of, i. 177; disgraced, 180; his league with the archbishop of Toledo against the crown, 181; assists in deposing Henry IV, 184; his intrigues to prevent a reconciliation of parties, 187; supports Joanna Beltraneja, 206, 276; threatens Isabella with imprisonment, 207; his endeavours to prevent the union of Ferdinand and Isabella, 211; appointed grand master of St. James, 222; his avarice, 224, n.; incenses Henry IV. against Isabella, 236; his death, 243; dissatisfied with the settlement of the queen's regency, iii. 278; favours Ferdinand, 346; his income, 519, n.

Visigoths, overrun Spain, i. 4; character of their laws, 5; Spain taken from them, 6; condition of slaves among them, 8.

W.

War of the Succession, i. 256.

Weights and measures, laws respecting, iii. 555.

West, belief of land in the, ii. 200.

West Indies, discovery of the, ii. 247; why so called, 254; regulations of trade with, 255; preparations for a second voyage to, 258. See Colonias, Hispaniola, and Indies.

Wool, in Spain, iii. 547.

X.

Ximenes, Cardinal, his famous Polyglot Bible, ii. 290, n.; his birth, 474; visits Rome, 475; his return and imprisonment, 476; established at Sigüenza, 477; enters the Franciscan order, ib.; his severe penance, 478; his ascetic life, 479; made guardian of Salzeda, 480; introduced to the queen, and made her confessor, 481 ; elected provincial, 482 ; his attempts at reform, 483 ; the see of Toledo offered to him, 487 ; he reluctantly accepts, 488 ; anecdotes of, 489 ; his austere life, 491 ; reform in his diocese, 492 ; example of his severity, 493 ; authorities on whom his life mainly rests, 500, n. ; his moral energy, 505 ; goes to Granada, 511 ; his violent measures for converting the Moors, 512 ; destroys Arabic books, 516 ; besieged in his palace, 520 ; his communications to the sovereigns respecting the revolt of the Albaycin, 524 ; hastens to court, ib. ; general approbation of his measures, 527 ; his rebuke of Vianelli, iii. 239, n. ; sustained by the queen, 253 ; remonstrates with Philip on the recklessness of his measures, 319 ; his influence, 329 ; his conduct upon the death of Philip, 330, 346, n. ; honours conferred ; his enthusiasm, 372 ; his designs against Oran, 373 ; his warlike preparations, 374 ; his perseverance, 375 ; sends an army to Africa, 376 ; addresses the troops, 377 ; relinquishes the command to Navarro, ib. ; his entry into Oran, 381 ; opposition to him, by Navarro, 383 ; his distrust of Ferdinand, 384 ; gives counsel to Navarro, and returns to Spain, 385 ; refuses public honours, ib. ; his return to Alcalá, 386 ; his general deportment, ib. ; visits the families of his diocese, ib. ; busily occupied with his university at Alcalá, 390 ; said to continue to watch over Oran after his death, ib. n. ; his reception of Ferdinand at the university of Alcalá, 395 ; account of his Polyglot Bible, 397 ; difficulties of the task, 399 ; persons employed about it, ib. n. ; his gratitude on its completion, 400 ; his projected edition of Aristotle, ib. n. ; grand projects of, 402 ; his bequest to the university at Alcalá, ib. ; the administration of Castile left to, 465, 466 ; meets with opposition respecting the regency, 486 ; opposes the desire of Charles to be proclaimed king, 487 ; replies to the Castilian aristocracy, 488 ;

his military ordinance, 489 ; his domestic policy, 490 ; his foreign policy, 494 ; sends a commission to Hispaniola, to ameliorate the condition of the natives, ib. 567 ; extends the Inquisition, 491 ; assumes the sole power, 493 ; intimidates the nobles, 494 ; burns Villafraata, ib. ; public discontents under, 495 ; his reception of Charles, 497 ; Charles's ungrateful letter to, 498 ; his last illness, 499 ; his death, 500 ; celebration of his obsequies, ib. ; Vergara's epitaph on, 501, n. ; his character, ib. ; his versatility of talent, ib. ; his bigotry, 502 ; his despotic government, 503 ; his moral principle, 504 ; his disinterestedness, 505 ; his self-confidence, ib. ; his chastity, 506 ; his monastic austerity, 507 ; anecdote in relation to his dress, ib. ; Quintanilla cited respecting, ib. n. ; his economy of time, 508 ; description of his person, 509 ; examination of his skull, ib. n. ; parallel between him and Richelieu, 510.

Z.

Zagal. See Abdallah.

Zahara surprised by the Moors, i. 436.

Zamora, Alfonso, employed in the compilation of the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399.

Zamora, defection of, i. 262 ; Ferdinand passes to, 267 ; King of Portugal arrives before, 268 ; surrender of, 277.

Zegri, a Moor, his conversion, ii. 515.

Zeli, Hamet, the defender of Ronda, intrusted with the command of Gebalfaro, ii. 94 ; his remark after his surrender, 116.

Zenete, Abrahen, a noble Moor, generosity of, ii. 109.

Zoraya, the sultana, jealous of the sultan, Abul Hacen, ii. 11 ; her success, 12 ; her embassy to Cordova for the redemption of Abdallah, 44 ; her reproof of Abdallah for his weakness, 180.

Zuniga, Lopez de, employed in the compilation of the Complutensian Polyglot, iii. 399, n.

Zurita, Gerónimo, his life and writings, ii. 387.

THE END.

100

